THE CENTURY CO. NEW YORK

THE CENTURY DICTIONARY

PREPARED UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF

WILLIAM DWIGHT WHITNEY, PH. D., LL. D.

PROFESSOR OF COMPARATIVE PHILOLOGY AND SANSKRIT IN YALE UNIVERSITY

THE plan of "The Century Dictionary" includes three things: the construction of a general dictionary of the English language which shall be serviceable for every literary and practical use; a more complete collection of the technical terms of the various sciences, arts, trades, and professions than has yet been attempted; and the addition to the definitions proper of such related encyclopedic matter, with pictorial illustrations, as shall constitute a convenient book of general reference.

About 200,000 words will be defined. The Dictionary will be a practically complete record of all the noteworthy words which have been in use since English literature has existed, especially of all that wealth of new words and of applications of old words which has sprung from the development of the thought and life of the nineteenth century. It will record not merely the written language, but the spoken language as well (that is, all important provincial and colloquial words), and it will include (in the one alphabetical order of the Dictionary) abbreviations and such foreign words and phrases as have become a familiar part of English speech.

THE ETYMOLOGIES.

The etymologies have been written anew on a uniform plan, and in accordance with the established principles of comparative philology. It has been possible in many cases, by means of the fresh material at the disposal of the etymologist, to clear up doubts or difficulties hitherto resting upon the history of particular words, to decide definitely in favor of one of several suggested etymologies, to discard numerous current errors, and to give for the first time the history of many words of which the etymologies were previously unknown or erroneously stated. Beginning with the current accepted form of spelling, each important word has been traced back through earlier forms to its remotest known origin. The various prefixes and suffixes useful in the formation of English words are treated very fully in separate articles.

HOMONYMS.

Words of various origin and meaning but of the same spelling, have been distinguished by small superior figures (^{1}, ^{2}, ^{3}, etc.). In numbering these homonyms the rule has been to give precedence to the oldest or the most familiar, or to that one which is most nearly English in origin. The superior numbers apply not so much to the individual word as to the group or root to which it belongs, hence the different grammatical uses of the same homonym are numbered alike when they are separately entered in the Dictionary. Thus a verb and a noun of the same origin and the same present spelling receive the same superior number. But when two words of the same form and of the same radical origin now differ considerably in meaning, so as to be used as different words, they are separately numbered.

THE ORTHOGRAPHY.

Of the great body of words constituting the familiar language the spelling is determined by well-established usage, and, however accidental and unacceptable, in many cases, it may be, it is not the office of a dictionary like this to propose improvements, or to adopt those which have been proposed and have not yet won some degree of acceptance and use. But there are also considerable classes as to which usage is wavering, more than one form being sanctioned by excellent authorities, either in this country or Great Britain, or in both. Familiar examples are words ending in or or our (as labor, labour), in er or re (as center, centre), in ize or ise (as civilize, civilise); those having a single or double consonant after an unaccented vowel (as traveler, traveller), or spelled with e or with æ or œ (as hemorrhage, hæmorrhage); and so on. In such cases both forms are given, with an expressed preference for the briefer one or the one more accordant with native analogies.

THE PRONUNCIATION.

No attempt has been made to record all the varieties of popular or even educated utterance, or to report the determinations made by different recognized authorities. It has been necessary rather to make a selection of words to which alternative pronunciations should be accorded, and to give preference among these according to the circumstances of each particular case, in view of the general analogies and tendencies of English utterance. The scheme by which the pronunciation is indicated is quite simple, avoiding over-refinement in the discrimination of sounds, and being designed to be readily understood and used. (See Key to Pronunciation on back cover.)

DEFINITIONS OF COMMON WORDS.

In the preparation of the definitions of common words, there has been at hand, besides the material generally accessible to students of the language, a special collection of quotations selected for this work from English books of all kinds and of all periods of the language, which is probably much larger than any which has hitherto been made for the use of an English dictionary, except that accumulated for the Philological Society of London. Thousands of non-technical words, many of them occurring in the classics of the language, and thousands of meanings, many of them familiar, which have not hitherto been noticed by the dictionaries, have in this way been obtained. The arrangement of the definitions historically, in the order in which the senses defined have entered the language, has been adopted wherever possible.

THE QUOTATIONS.

These form a very large collection (about 200,000), representing all periods and branches of English literature. The classics of the language have been drawn upon, and valuable citations have been made from less famous authors in all departments of literature. American writers especially are represented in greater fullness than in any similar work. A list of authors and works (and editions) cited will be published with the concluding part of the Dictionary.

DEFINITIONS OF TECHNICAL TERMS.

Much space has been devoted to the special terms of the various sciences, fine arts, mechanical arts, professions, and trades, and much care has been bestowed upon their treatment. They have been collected by an extended search through all branches of literature, with the design of providing a very complete and many-sided technical dictionary. Many thousands of words have thus been gathered which have never before been recorded in a general dictionary, or even in special glossaries. To the biological sciences a degree of prominence has been given corresponding to the remarkable recent increase in their vocabulary. The new material in the departments of biology and zoölogy includes not less than five thousand words and senses not recorded even in special dictionaries. In the treatment of physical and mathematical sciences, of the mechanical arts and trades, and of the philological sciences, an equally broad method has been adopted. In the definition of theological and ecclesiastical terms, the aim of the Dictionary has been to present all the special doctrines of the different divisions of the Church in such a manner as to convey to the reader the actual intent of those who accept them. In defining legal terms the design has been to offer all the information that is needed by the general reader, and also to aid the professional reader by giving in a concise form all the important technical words and meanings. Special attention has also been paid to the definitions of the principal terms of painting, etching, engraving, and various other art-processes; of architecture, sculpture, archæology, decorative art, ceramics, etc.; of musical terms, nautical and military terms, etc.

ENCYCLOPEDIC FEATURES.

The inclusion of so extensive and varied a vocabulary, the introduction of special phrases, and the full description of things often found essential to an intelligible definition of their names, would alone have given to this Dictionary a distinctly encyclopedic character. It has, however, been deemed desirable to go somewhat further in this direction than these conditions render strictly necessary.

Accordingly, not only have many technical matters been treated with unusual fullness, but much practical information of a kind which dictionaries have hitherto excluded has been added. The result is that "The Century Dictionary" covers to a great extent the field of the ordinary encyclopedia, with this principal difference — that the information given is for the most part distributed under the individual words and phrases with which it is connected, instead of being collected under a few general topics. Proper names, both biographical and geographical, are of course omitted, except as they appear in derivative adjectives, as Darwinian from Darwin, or Indian from India. The alphabetical distribution of the encyclopedic matter under a large number of words will, it is believed, be found to be particularly helpful in the search for those details which are generally looked for in works of reference.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

The pictorial illustrations have been so selected and executed as to be subordinate to the text, while possessing a considerable degree of independent suggestiveness and artistic value. To secure technical accuracy, the illustrations have, as a rule, been selected by the specialists in charge of the various departments, and have in all cases been examined by them in proofs. The cuts number about six thousand.

MODE OF ISSUE, PRICE, ETC.

"The Century Dictionary" will be comprised in about 6,500 quarto pages. It is published by subscription and in twenty-four parts or sections, to be finally bound into six quarto volumes, if desired by the subscriber. These sections will be issued about once a month. The price of the sections is $2.50 each, and no subscriptions are taken except for the entire work.

The plan for the Dictionary is more fully described in the preface (of which the above is in part a condensation), which accompanies the first section, and to which reference is made.

A list of the abbreviations used in the etymologies and definitions, and keys to pronunciations and to signs used in the etymologies, will be found on the back cover-lining.

The king is but a man as I am; the violet smells to him as it doth to me; . . . all his senses have but human conditions. Shak., Hen. V., iv. 1. 106.

And now look about you, and see how pleasantly that meadow looks; nay, and the earth smells as sweetly too.
I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 107.

2. Specifically, to give out an offensive odor: as, how the place smells!

Ham. Dost thou think Alexander looked o' this fashion i' the earth?
Hor. E'en so.
Ham. And smelt so? pah! [Puts down the skull.
Shak., Hamlet, v. 1. 221.

3. To have an odor (of a specified kind); be scented with: with of: as, to smell of roses.

A dim shop, low in the roof and smelling strong of glue and footlights.
R. L. Stevenson, A Penny Plain, 2d. Coloured.

4. Figuratively, to appear to be of a certain nature or character, as indicated by the smell: generally followed by like or of.

"Thou smells of a coward," said Robin Hood,
"Thy words do not please me."
Robin Hood and the Golden Arrow (Child's Ballads, V. 385).

What say you to young Master Fenton? he capers, he dances, he has eyes of youth, he writes verses, he speaks holiday, he smells April and May.
Shak., M. W. of W., iii. 2. 69.

These are circumstances which smell strongly of imposture and contrivance. Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. 1.

5. To inhale a smell or odor as a gratification or as a test of kind or quality, etc.: colloquially with of, formerly sometimes with to or unto.

To pulle a rose of alle that route, . . .
And smellen to it where I wente.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 1669.

Smell to this flower; here Nature has her excellence.
Fletcher (and another?), Prophetess, v. 3.

I'm not nice, nor care who plucks the Rose I smell to, provided it has not lost its Sweetness.
Mrs. Centlivre, Platonick Lady, i.

A young girl's heart, which he held in his hand, and smelled to, like a rosebud.
Hawthorne, Blithedale Romance, ix.

6. To snuff; try to smell something; figuratively, to try to smell out something: generally with about: as, to go smelling about.—A smelling committee, an investigating committee. [Colloq., U. S.]—To smell of the footlights, of the lamp, of the roast†, etc. See footlights, etc.

smell (smel), n. [< ME. smel, smil, smul, smeal, smeol (not found in AS.): see the verb.] 1. The faculty of perceiving by the nose; sense-perception through the olfactory nerves; the olfactory faculty or function; the physiological process or function whereby certain odoriferous qualities of bodies, as scent or effluvium, are perceived and recognized through sensation; olfaction; scent: often with the definite article, as one of the special senses: as, the smell in dogs is keen. The essential organ of smell is located in a special part or lobe of the brain, the rhinencephalon, or olfactory lobe, whence are given off more or fewer olfactory nerves, which pass out of the cranial cavity into the nasal organ, or nose, in the mucous or Schneiderian membrane of the interior of which they ramify, so that air laden with odoriferous particles can affect the nerves when it is drawn into or through the nasal passages. In man the sense of smell is very feeble and imperfect in comparison with that of many animals, especially of the carnivores, which pursue their prey by scent, and ruminants, which escape their enemies by the same means. Smell in the lower animals seems to be the guiding sense in determining their choice of food.

Memory, imagination, old sentiments and associations, are more readily reached through the sense of smell than by almost any other channel. O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, iv.

Smell is a sensation excited by the contact with the olfactory region of certain substances, usually in a gaseous condition and necessarily in a state of fine subdivision.
Encyc. Brit., XXII. 165.

It will be observed that sound is more promptly reacted on than either sight or touch. Taste and smell are slower than either. W. James, Prin. of Psychology, I. 96.

His [Thoreau's] smell was so dainty that he could perceive the fœtor of dwelling-houses as he passed them by at night. R. L. Stevenson, Thoreau, i.

2. That quality of anything which is or may be smelled; an odoriferous effluvium; an odor or scent, whether agreeable or offensive; a fragrance, perfume, or stench; aroma: as, the smell of thyme; the smell of bilge-water.

Theise men lyven be the smelle of wylde Apples.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 297.

Suettere smul ne myzte be theu the smoke smulde.
Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 42.

And there came a smell off the shore like the smell of a garden. Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 27.

Impatient of some crowded room's close smell.
Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, iv.

3. A faint impression; a subtle suggestion; a hint; a trace: as, the poem has a smell of the woods.—4. An act of smelling: as, he took a smell at the bottle.—Syn. Smell, Scent, Odor, Savor, Perfume, Fragrance, Aroma, Stench, Stink. Smell and scent express the physical sense, the exercise of the sense, and the thing which appeals to the sense. The others have only the last of these three meanings. Of the nine words the first four may express that which is pleasant or unpleasant, the next three only that which is pleasant, the last two only that which is very unpleasant. Smell is the general word; the others are species under it. Scent is the smell that proceeds naturally from something that has life: as, the scent of game; the scent of the tea-rose. Odor is little more than a Latin substitute for smell: as, the odor of musk, of decaying vegetation; it may be a dainty word, as smell cannot be. Savor is a distinctive smell, suggesting taste or flavor, proceeding especially from some article of food: as, the savor of garlic. Perfume is generally a strong or rich but agreeable smell. Fragrance is best used to express fresh, delicate, and delicious odors, especially such as emanate from living things: as, the fragrance of the violet, of new-mown hay, of the breath of an infant. Aroma should be restricted to a somewhat spicy smell: as, the aroma of roasted coffee, or of the musk-rose. Stench and stink are historically the same word, in different degrees of strength, representing a strong, penetrating, and disgusting odor; stink is not for polite use.

smellable (smel′a-bl), a. [< smell + -able.] Capable of being smelled. [Rare.]

An apple is a complex of visible, tangible, smellable, tastable qualities. Science, VIII. 377.

smeller (smel′ėr), n. [< smell + -er[1].] 1. One who or that which smells or perceives the smell of anything; also, one who tests anything by smelling.—2. One who or that which smells of anything, is scented, or has odor.

Such nasty smellers
That, if they'd been unfurnished of club-truncheons,
They might have cudgell'd me with their very stink,
It was so strong and sturdy.
Fletcher (and another?), Nice Valour, v. 1.

3. The nose; in the plural, the nostrils. [Slang.]

For he on smellers, you must know, Receiv'd a sad unlucky blow.
Cotton, Scarronides, p. 64. (Davies.)

4. Familiarly, a feeler; a tactile hair or process; especially, a rictal vibrissa, as one of a cat's whiskers.—5. A prying fellow; one who tries to smell out something; a sneaking spy. [Slang.]

smell-feast (smel′fēst), n. [< smell, v., + obj., feast. In def. 2 < smell, n., + feast.] 1. One who finds and frequents good tables; an epicure. [Low.]

No more smell-feast Vitellio Smiles on his master for a meal or two.
Bp. Hall, Satires, VI. i. 47.

2. A feast at which the guests are supposed to feed upon the odors of the viands. Imp. Dict.

smelling (smel′ing), n. [< ME. smellinge, smellynge; verbal n. of smell, v.] The sense of smell; olfaction.

If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling?
1 Cor. xii. 17.

smelling-bottle (smel′ing-bot′l), n. A small portable bottle or flask, usually of fanciful form or decorated, (a) for containing smelling-salts, or (b) for containing an agreeable perfume.

Handkerchiefs were pulled out, smelling bottles were handed round; hysterical sobs and screams were heard.
Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

smelling-salts (smel′ing-sâlts), n. pl. A preparation of ammonium carbonate with some agreeable scent, as lavender or bergamot, used as a stimulant and restorative in faintness and for the relief of headache.

At this point she was so entirely overcome that a squadron of cousins and aunts had to come to the rescue, with perfumes and smelling-salts and fans, before she was sufficiently restored. Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 547.

smell-less (smel′les), a. [< smell + -less.] 1. Having no sense of smell; not olfactive.—2. Having no smell or odor; scentless.

smell-smock† (smel′smok), n. [< smell + obj. smock.] 1. One who runs after women; a licentious man. [Low.]

If thou dost not prove as arrant a smell-smock as any the town affords in a term-time, I'll lose my judgment.
Middleton, More Dissemblers Besides Women, i. 4.

2. The lady's-smock, Cardamine pratensis; rarely, the wind-flower, Anemone nemorosa. Britten and Holland, Eng. Plant Names. [Prov. Eng.]

smell-trap (smel′trap), n. A drain-trap (which see); a stink-trap.

"Where have you been staying?" "With young Lord Vieuxbois, among high art and painted glass, spade farms, and model smell-traps." Kingsley, Yeast, vi.

smelly (smel′i), a. [< smell + -y[1].] Having an odor, especially an offensive one. [Colloq.]

Nasty, dirty, frowzy, grubby, smelly old monks.
Kingsley, Water-Babies, p. 186.

smelt[1] (smelt), v. [Formerly also smilt; not found in ME.; < MD. smelten, smilten, D. smelten = MLG. smelten, LG. smulten = OHG. smelzen, smelzan, smalzjan, MHG. smelzen, G. schmelzen = Icel. smelta = Sw. smälta = Dan. smelte, fuse, smelt; causal of G. schmelzen = Sw. smälta = Dan. smelte, melt, dissolve, become liquid; cf. MD. smalt, grease or melted butter, D. smalt, enamel, = OHG. MHG. smalz, G. schmalz, fat, grease, > It. smalto, enamel, dial. smalzo, butter, = F. émail, enamel: see smalt, amel, enamel. Connection with melt is doubtful.] I. trans. To fuse; melt; specifically, to treat (ore) in the large way, and chiefly in a furnace or by the aid of heat, for the purpose of separating the contained metal. Metallurgical operations carried on in the moist way, as the amalgamation of gold and silver ores in pans, treatment by lixiviation, etc., are not generally designated by the term smelting. Establishments where this is done are more commonly called mills or reduction-works, and those in which iron is smelted are usually designated as blast-furnaces or iron-furnaces. The various smelting operations differ greatly from each other, according to the nature of the combinations operated on. Simple ores, like galena, require only a very simple series of operations, which are essentially continuous in one and the same furnace; more complicated combinations, like the mixtures of various cupriferous ores smelted at Swansea by the English method, require several successive operations, entirely disconnected from each other, and performed in different furnaces. In the most general way, the essential order of succession of the various processes by which the sulphureted ores (and most ores are sulphurets) are treated is as follows: (1) calcination or roasting, to oxidize and get rid (as far as possible) of the sulphur; (2) reduction of the metal contained in the oxidized combinations obtained; (3) refining, or getting rid of the last traces of deleterious metals associated in the ores with the useful metal, to obtain which is the essential object of the operation.

II. intrans. To fuse; melt; dissolve.

Having too much water, many corns will smilt, or have their pulp turned into a substance like thick cream.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

smelt[2] (smelt), n. [< ME. smelt, < AS. smelt = Norw. smelta = Dan. smelt, a smelt (applied to various small fishes); perhaps so called because it was 'smooth'; cf. AS. smolt, smylt, serene, smooth (as the sea): see smolt[2].] 1. Any one of various small fishes. (a) A small fish of the family Argentinidæ and the genus Osmerus. The common European smelt is the sparling, O. eperlanus; it becomes about 10 to 12 inches long, and is of an olive-green above and a silvery white below, with a silver longitudinal lateral band. It exhales when fresh a peculiar scent suggesting the cucumber. This fish is prized as a delicacy. The corresponding American smelt is O. mordax, of the Atlantic coast from Virginia northward, anadromous to some extent, and otherwise very similar to the sparling. There are several true smelts of the Pacific coast of North America, as O. thaleichthys, the Californian smelt, and O. dentex, the Alaska smelt. Hence —(b) Any other species of the family Argentinidæ related to the smelt, such as the Hypomesus pretiosus or olidus, also called surf-smelt, which is distinguished from the true smelts by having the dorsal mostly advanced beyond the ventrals and by the much smaller mouth and weak teeth. It inhabits the Pacific coast of the United States from California northward, reaches a length of about 12 inches, and is highly esteemed as a food-fish. (c) In California, any species of the family Atherinidæ, resembling the true smelt in general appearance, but provided with an anterior spinous and a posterior branched dorsal fin, and having the ventrals not far behind the pectorals. The common Californian smelt, Atherinopsis californiensis, reaches a length of about 18 inches, and its flesh is fine, firm, and of excellent flavor, though a little dry. It is one of the most important food-fishes of California, never absent from the markets. Other species are Atherinops affinis, the little smelt, and Leuresthes tenuis. (d) A freshwater cyprinoid, Hybognathus regius, which somewhat resembles the true smelt in form, translucency, and color; also, one of other cyprinoids, as the spawn-eater and the silversides. [Eastern U. S.] (e) A gadoid fish, Microgadus proximus, the tom-cod of the Pacific slope. [San Francisco.] (f) The smolt, a young salmon before its visit to the sea. [Eng.] (g) The lance or lant. See sand-eel, and cut under Ammodytidæ.

2†. A gull; a simpleton.

These direct men, they are no men of fashion;
Talk what you will, this is a very smelt.
Fletcher (and another), Love's Pilgrimage, v. 2.

Cup. What 's he, Mercury?
Mer. A notable smelt. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, ii. 1.

Mullet-smelt, Atherinopsis californiensis. See def. 1 (c). —New Zealand smelt. See Retropinna.

smelter (smel'tėr), n. [< smelt[1] + -er[1].] 1. One who is engaged in smelting, or who works in an establishment where ores are smelted.—2. In the Cordilleran region, smelting-works. [Recent.]

At Denver is made much of the machinery used at the various camps, and to its furnaces and smelters is shipped a large proportion of the precious ores.
Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 950.

smeltery (smel'tėr-i), n.; pl. smelteries (-iz). [< smelt[1] + -ery.] An establishment or place for smelting ores.

The product of the smeltery in 1886 had a money value of $1,105,190.76. Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 592.

smeltie (smel'ti), n. [Dim. of smelt[2].] A kind of codfish, the bib. [Scotch.]

smelting-furnace (smel'ting-fėr″nās), n. A furnace in which metals are separated from their ores. See blast-furnace, reverberatory furnace (under reverberatory, 2), and cut in next column.

smelting-house (smel'ting-hous), n. In metal., a building erected over a smelting-furnace; smelting-works.

smelting-works (smel'ting-wėrks), n. pl. and sing. A building or set of buildings in which the business of smelting ore is carried on. Compare smelter, 2.

smerch†, v. An obsolete spelling of smirch.

Smelting-furnace.

a, fire-brick lining; b, masonry; c, opening in the side of the upper part of the furnace through which it is charged; e, bushes; f, throat; g, hearth or crucible; h, dam-stone; i, twyer. That part lying below the widest diameter, above the bushes, is called the shaft.

smeret, n. and v. An obsolete spelling of smear.

smere-gavel, n. Same as smear-gavel.

Smerinthus (smē-rin'thus), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1802), < Gr. σμίρινθος, μίρινθος, a cord, line.] 1. A genus of sphinx-moths, of the family Sphingidæ, having the antennæ serrate. S. ocellatus is the eyed sphinx; S. populi, the poplar-sphinx; and S. tiliæ, the lime-sphinx or hawk-moth.—2. [l. c.] A moth of this genus: as, the lime-smerinthus, whose larva feeds on the lime-tree or linden.

smerk†. An old spelling of smirk[1], smirk[2].

smerky†, a. An obsolete form of smirky.

smert†, n., v., and a. An old spelling of smart[1].

smethe[1]†, a. A Middle English form of smooth.

smethe[2], n. 1. Same as smew.—2. Same as smee, 4.

smew (smū), n. [Prob. a var. (simulating mew[1] ?) of smee, ult. of smeuth: see smee, smeath. The conjecture that smew is a contraction of icemew* is untenable, even if such a name as icemew existed.] A small merganser or fishing-duck, Mergellus albellus, the white nun, or smee, of the family Anatidæ and subfamily Merginæ, Smew (Mergellus albellus), adult male.

inhabiting northerly parts of the eastern hemisphere. The male in adult plumage is a very beautiful bird, of a pure white, varied with black and gray, and tinged with green on the crested head; the length is about 17 inches. The female is smaller, with reddish-brown and gray plumage, and is called the red-headed smew. Also smeath.—Hooded smew, the hooded merganser, Lophodytes cucullatus, resembling and related to the above, but of another genus. See cut under merganser.

smicker† (smik'ėr), a. [< ME. smiker, < AS. smicor*, smicer*, smicere, smicre = OHG. smehhar, smechar, MHG. smecker, neat, elegant; perhaps related to MHG. smicke, sminke, G. schminke, paint, rouge; but the Sw. smickra = Dan. smigre, flatter, Sw. smicker = Dan. smiger, flattery, belong to a prob. different root, MHG. smeicheln, G. schmeicheln, flatter, freq. of MHG. smeichen, flatter, MLG. smeken, smeiken = D. smeeken, supplicate; OHG. smeih, smeich, MHG. smeich, flattery. Cf. smug.] 1. Elegant; fine; gay.

He fell off heffne dun . . .
And warrth till atell defell thær Off shene and smikerr enngell.
Ormulum, l. 13679.

Herdgroom, what gars thy pipe to go so loud?
Why bin thy looks so smicker and so proud?
Peele, An Eclogue.

2. Amorous.

smicker† (smik'ėr), v. i. [< smicker, a.] To look amorously. Kersey.

smickering† (smik'ėr-ing), n. [Verbal n. of smicker, v.] An amorous inclination.

We had a young Doctour, who rode by our coach, and seem'd to have a smickering to our young lady of Pilton.
Dryden, Letters, p. 88 (To Mrs. Steward, Sept. 28, 1699).

smicket (smik'et), n. [< smock (with usual variation of the vowel) + -et.] A smock. [Prov. Eng.]

Wide antlers, which had whilom grac'd
A stag's bold brow, on pitchforks plac'd,
The roaring, dancing bumpkins show,
And the white smickets wave below.
Combe, Dr. Syntax's Tours, ii. 5. (Davies.)

smickly† (smik'li), adv. [< smick*, var. of smug (or apparent base of smicker), + -ly[2].] Neatly; trimly; amorously.

Ra. What 's hee that looks so smickly?
Fol. A Flounder in a frying-pan, still skipping; . . . hee 's an Italian dancer. Dekker and Ford, Sun's Darling, ii.

Smicra (smik'rą), n. [NL. (Spinola, 1811), < Gr. σμικρός, var. of μικρός, small: see micron.] A genus of parasitic hymenopterous insects, of the family Chalcididæ, having enlarged hind femora, armed with one or two large teeth followed by numerous smaller ones. Most of the American species which have been placed in this genus belong to the allied genus Spilochalcis.

smiddum-tails (smid'um-tālz), n. pl. [< smiddum, var. of smeddum, + tail[1] (pl. tails, ends, 'foots').] In mining, the sludge or slimy part deposited in washing ore. Simmonds.

smiddy (smid'i), n.; pl. smiddies (-iz). A dialectal variant of smithy.

smidgen (smij'en), n. [Origin obscure; perhaps for orig. smitching*, < smitch + -ing[3].] A small piece; a small quantity.

Smidgen, "a small bit, a grain," as "a smidgen of meal," is common in East Tennessee.
Trans. Amer. Philol. Ass., XVII. 43.

smift (smift), n. [Origin obscure.] A bit of touchwood, touch-paper, greased candle-wick, or paper or cotton dipped in melted sulphur, used to ignite the train or squib in blasting. This old method of setting off a blast has been almost entirely done away with by the introduction of the safety-fuse. Also called snuff.

smight†, r. An obsolete erroneous spelling of smite.

Smilaceæ (smī-lā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (R. Brown, 1810), for Smilacaceæ*, < Smilax (Smilac-) + -aceæ.] A group of monocotyledonous plants, by many regarded as a distinct order, but now classed as a tribe of the order Liliaceæ. It is characterized by a sarmentose or climbing stem, three- to five-nerved leaves, anthers apparently of a single cell, the inner cell being very narrow, and ovules solitary or twin. It includes the typical genus Smilax, and 2 small genera of about 5 species each, Heterosmilax of eastern Asia, and Rhipogonum of Australia and New Zealand.

Smilacina (smī-lą-sī'nä), n. [NL. (Desfontaines, 1807), < Smilax (-ac-) + -ina[1].] A genus of liliaceous plants, of the tribe Polygonateæ. It is characterized by flowers in a terminal panicle or raceme with a spreading six-parted perianth, six stamens, and a three-celled ovary which becomes in fruit a globose pulpy berry, often with but a single seed. There are about 20 species, all natives of the northern hemisphere; 3 occur in the eastern and 3 in the Pacific United States—only one, S. stellata, being common to both; 7 species are natives of Mexico and Central America, and others are found in Asia. They are somewhat delicate plants, producing an erect unbranched leafy stem from a creeping rootstock, and bearing alternate short-petioled leaves and small usually white or cream-colored flowers. They are known by the name of false Solomon's-seal, especially S. racemosa, the larger Eastern species, the rhizome of which is said to be diuretic, diaphoretic, and a mild alterative.

Smilax (smī'laks), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. smilax, < Gr. σμίλαξ, the yew (also μίλαξ), also a kind of evergreen oak; σμίλαξ κηπαία, 'garden smilax,' a leguminous plant, the fruit of which was dressed and eaten like kidney-beans; σμίλαξ ἑλεία, 'smooth smilax,' a kind of bindweed or convolvulus.] 1. A genus of liliaceous plants, type of the tribe Smilaceæ. It is characterized by dioecious flowers in umbels, with a perianth of six distinct curving segments, the fertile containing several, sometimes six, thread-shaped staminodes, three broad recurved stigmas, and a three-celled ovary which becomes in fruit a globose berry usually containing but one or two seeds. There are about 200 species, widely scattered through most tropical and temperate regions; 11 occur in the northeastern United States. They are usually woody vines from a stout rootstock, bearing alternate two-ranked evergreen leaves with reticulated veins, and small greenish flowers in umbels or umbellate racemes. The fruit is a black or red berry. The species are known as greenbrier, bamboo-brier, catbrier, China-root, rough bindweed, etc. See cut under Liliaceæ.

Flowering Branch of Smilax rotundifolia. a, the fruit.

ulated veins between the three or more prominent nerves. The petioles are persistent at the base, and are often furnished with two tendrils, by which some species climb to great heights, and others mat into densely tangled thickets. Various tropical American species yield sarsaparilla. (See sarsaparilla and china-root.) S. aspera of the south of Europe, called rough bindweed or prickly ivy, is the source of Italian sarsaparilla. Other species are used medicinally in India, Australia, Mauritius, and the Philippines. One of these, S. glycyphylla, an evergreen shrubby climber of Australia, is there known as sweet tea, from the use of its leaves. The rootstocks of many species are large and tuberiferous; those of S. Pseudo-China are used in the southern United States to fatten hogs, and as the source of a domestic beer; those of S. China yield a dye. The stems of some pliant species, as S. Pseudo-China, are used in basket-making, and the young shoots of a Persian species are there used as asparagus. S. Pseudo-China and S. bona-nox are known as bullbrier, and several others with prickly stems as catbrier and greenbrier. See also carrion-flower.

2. [l. c.] (a) A plant of the genus Smilax. (b) A delicate greenhouse vine from the Cape of Good Hope, best known as Myrsiphyllum asparagoides, now classed under Asparagus. Its apparent leaves (really expanded branches) are bright-green on both sides, with the aspect of those of Smilax, but finer. The plant grows to a length of several feet, festooning beautifully. It is much used in decoration, and forms the leading green constituent in bouquets. It is sometimes called Boston smilax.

3. In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects. Laporte, 1835.

At every stroke their jackets did smoke.
Robin Hood and the Ranger (Child's Ballads, V. 209).

Smoking salts. See salt[1].

II. trans. 1. To apply smoke to; blacken with smoke; hang in smoke; medicate or dry by smoke; fumigate: as, to smoke infected clothing; to subject to the action of smoke, as meat; cure by means of smoke; smoke-dry; also, to incense. Smoking meat consists in exposing meat previously salted, or rubbed over with salt, to wood-smoke in an apartment so distant from the fire as not to be unduly heated by it, the smoke being admitted by flues at the bottom of the side walls. Here the meat absorbs the empyreumatic acid of the smoke, and is dried at the same time. The kind of wood used affects the quality and taste of the meat, smoke from beech and oak being preferable to that from fir and larch. Smoke from the twigs and berries of juniper, or from rosemary, peppermint, etc., imparts somewhat of the aromatic flavor of these plants. A slow smoking with a slender fire is better than a quick and hot one, as it allows the empyreumatic principles time to penetrate into the interior without over-drying the outside.

Smokyng the temple. Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1423.

Being entertained for a perfumer, as I was smoking a musty room, comes me the prince.
Shak., Much Ado, i. 3. 60.

An old smoked wall, on which the rain
Ran down in streaks! B. Jonson, Volpone, i. 1.

2. To affect in some way with smoke; especially, to drive or expel by smoke: generally with out; also, to destroy or kill, as bees, by smoke.

Are not these flies gone yet? Pray quit my house, I'll smoke you out else. B. Jonson, Staple of News, ii. 1.

The king, upon that outrage against his person, smoked the Jesuits out of his nest.
Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion (ed. 1605), G. 3 b. (Latham.)

So the king arose, and went To smoke the scandalous hive of those wild bees
That made such honey in his realm.
Tennyson, Holy Grail.

3. To draw smoke from into the mouth and puff it out; also, to burn or use in smoking; inhale the smoke of: as, to smoke tobacco or opium; to smoke a pipe or a cigar.

Here would he smoke his pipe of a sultry afternoon, enjoying the soft southern breeze.
Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 160.

4. To smell out; find out; scent; perceive; perceive the meaning of; suspect. [Archaic.]

I'll hang you both, you rascals!
. . . you for the purse you cut
In Paul's at a sermon; I have smoaked you, ha!
Massinger, City Madam, iii. 1.

It must be a very plausive invention that carries it; they begin to smoke me. Shak., All's Well, iv. 1. 30.

5†. To sneer at; quiz; ridicule to one's face.

This is a vile dog; I see that already. No offence! Ha, ha, ha! to him; to him, Petulant; smoke him.
Congreve, Way of the World, iii. 15.

Pray, madam, smoke miss yonder biting her lips, and playing with her fan. Swift, Polite Conversation, i.

Why, you know you never laugh at the old folks, and never fly at your servants, nor smoke people before their faces. Miss Burney, Cecilia, vi. 11.

6. To raise dust from by beating; "dust": as, I'll smoke his jacket for him. [Colloq.]

I'll smoke your skin-coat, an I catch you right.
Shak., K. John, ii. 1. 139.

Smoked pearl. See pearl.

smoke (smōk), n. [Early mod. E. also smoak; < ME. smoke, < AS. smoca (rare), < smeócan (pret. smeác, pp. smocen), smoke, reek: see smoke, v. This form has taken the place of the more orig. noun, E. dial. smeech, < ME. smeech, smeke, < AS. smēc, smȳc, umlaut forms of smeác (= D. smook = MLG. smōk, LG. smook = MHG. smouch, G. schmauch, G. dial. schmoch = Dan. smög), smoke, < smeócan (pp. smocen), smoke: see smoke, v.] 1. Bulwer, Caxtons, xiv. 2.

2. Obscene or filthy language.

He does not stand upon decency in conversation, but will talk smut, though a priest and his mother be in the room.
Addison, The Lover, No. 29.

3. A fungous disease of plants, affecting especially the cereal plants, to many of which it is exceedingly destructive. It is caused by fungi of the family Ustilagineæ. There are in the United States two well-defined kinds of smut in cereals: (a) the black smut, produced by Ustilago segetum, in which the head is mostly changed to a black dust; (b) the stinking smut (called bunt in England), which shows only when the kernel is broken open, the usual contents being found to be replaced by a black unctuous powder. The stinking smut is caused by two species of fungus, which differ only in microscopic characters—Tilletia tritici, with rough spores, and T. fœtens, with smooth spores. It is the most destructive disease of wheat known, not infrequently causing the loss of half of the crop or more. It occurs to some extent throughout all the wheat-growing regions, but is especially common in Indiana, Iowa, and adjacent States, as well as in California and Europe. The disease does not spread from plant to plant or from field to field, but the infection takes place at the time the seed sprouts. No remedy can be applied after the grain is sown, but the disease can be prevented by sowing clean seed in clean soil and covering well. Smutty seed can be purified by wetting thoroughly with a solution of blue vitriol, using one pound or more to a gallon of water. Black smut may be similarly treated. U. Maydis is the smut of Indian corn; U. destruens, of Setaria glauca; U. urseolum, of many species of Carex, etc. See Ustilago, Tilletia, maize-smut, bunt[4], bunt-ear, burnt-ear, brand, 6.

sneer (snēr), r. [Formerly also snear; < ME. sneren, < Dan. snærre, grin like a dog; akin to snar, snarl[1].] I. intrans. 1†. To grin or laugh foolishly.

A fourth would fondly kiss and paw his companions, and snear in their faces, with a countenance more antic than any in a Dutch droll. Beverley, Virginia, iv. ¶ 18.

2. To grin; especially and usually, to grin or smile in a contemptuous manner; express contempt by a grimace marked by slight turning up of the nose.

I have no power over one muscle in their faces, though they sneered at every word spoken by each other. Tatler.

3. To insinuate contempt by a covert expression; use words suggestive rather than expressive of contempt; speak derisively.

To sneer at the sentiments which are the springs of all just and virtuous actions is merely a display of unthinking levity, or of want of the natural sensibilities.
O. W. Holmes, Essays, p. 92.

=Syn. 3. Scoff, Sneer, Jeer, Gibe. Scoff is the strongest word for the expression of utter contempt or abhorrence by opprobrious language. To sneer is to express contempt by more or less covert sarcasm. To jeer is to try to raise a laugh by sarcastic language. To gibe is to use contemptuous, mocking, or taunting expression.

II. trans. 1. To treat or address with sneers; treat with contempt; sneer at.

He had sneer'd Sir Thomas Hanmer for changing Sirrah into Sir.
T. Edwards, Canons of Criticism (1765), p. 75. (Hall.)

2. To utter with a contemptuous expression or grimace.

"A ship of fools," he shriek'd in spite,
"A ship of fools," he sneer'd and wept.
Tennyson, The Voyage.

3. To affect in a specified way by sneering.

Very likely they were laughing over his infatuation, and sneering her fair fame away, at that very moment in the clubs. Whyte Melville, White Rose, II. xviii.

sneer (snēr), n. [< sneer, v.] 1. A derisive or contemptuous grin or smile; an expression of the face marked by a slight turning up of the nose, and indicating contempt; a look of scorn, disdain, or derision; hence, the feeling thus expressed.

That smile, if oft observed and near,
Waned in its mirth, and wither'd to a sneer.
Byron, Lara, i. 17.

2. A verbal expression of contempt; an insinuation of scorn or derision by language more or less covert and indirect.

Who can refute a sneer? Paley, Moral Philos., II. v. 9.

sneerer (snēr'ėr), n. [< sneer + -er[1].] One who sneers.

sneerful (snēr'fûl), a. [< sneer + -ful.] Given to sneering. [Rare.]

sneevle†, v. An obsolete form of snivel.

sneeze (snēz), v.; pret. and pp. sneezed, ppr. sneezing. [Early mod. E. also sneese, snese, sneze; < ME. snesen, a variant, with substitution of sn- for the uncommon initial sequence fn-, of fnesen, < AS. fneósan = D. fniezen, sneeze, = Icel. fnæsa, later fnȳsa, sneeze, = Sw. fnysa = Dan. fnyse, snort: see fnese, and cf. neeze.] I. intrans. To emit air from the nose and mouth audibly and violently by an involuntary convulsive action, as occasioned by irritation of the lining membrane of the nose or by stimulation of the retina by a bright light. In sneezing the glottis remains open, while the passage out through the mouth is partially obstructed by the approximation of the tongue to the roof of the mouth. See sneezing.

Mr. Haliburton brings forward, as his strongest case, the habit of saying "God bless you" or some equivalent expression when a person sneezes. He shows that this custom, which, I admit, appears to us at first sight both odd and arbitrary, is ancient and widely extended. It is mentioned by Homer, Aristotle, Apuleius, Pliny, and the Jewish rabbis, and has been observed in Koordistan, in Florida, in Otaheite, and in the Tonga Islands.
Sir J. Lubbock, Orig. of Civilisation, p. 335.

To sneeze at, to disregard; show contempt for; despise: now chiefly in the expression not to be sneezed at. [Colloq.]

A buxom, tall, and comely dame,
Who wish'd, 'twas said, to change her name,
And, if I could her thoughts divine,
Would not perhaps have sneez'd at mine.
W. Combe, Dr. Syntax's Tours, ii. 5.

My professional reputation is not to be sneezed at.
Sir A. H. Elton, Below the Surface, xxvii.

II. trans. To utter with or like a sneeze.

Shall not Love to me,
As in the Latin song I learnt at school,
Sneeze out a full God-bless-you right and left?
Tennyson, Edwin Morris.

sneeze (snēz), n. [Early mod. E. also sneese; < sneeze, v.] 1. The act of one who sneezes, or the sound made by sneezing; sudden and violent ejection of air through the nose and mouth with an audible sound.—2. Snuff. Also snish. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—Cup o' sneeze. See cup.

sneeze-horn (snēz'hôrn), n. A sort of snuff-box made of an animal's horn. Halliwell.

sneezer (snē'zėr), n. [< sneeze + -er[1].] 1. One who sneezes.

When a Hindu sneezes, bystanders say "Live!" and the sneezer replies "With you!"
E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, I. 101.

2. A violent blow; a blow that knocks the breath out. [Prov. Eng.]

sneezeweed (snēz'wēd), n. A plant of the genus Helenium, mostly the common H. autumnale. In England this, though rather coarse, is known in ornamental culture. Its powdered leaves and flowers when snuffed up produce violent sneezing. Recently the finer southwestern species, H. tenuifolium, has received some notice. It is poisonous to human beings and to horses. Both plants have been advocated for medical use in nervous diseases. Less properly called sneezewort. See cut under Helenium.

sneezewood (snēz'wůd), n. [A translation of S. African D. nies-hout, < D. niezen, sneeze (= E. neeze), + hout, wood (= E. holt[1]).] A South African tree, Ptæroxylon utile, or its timber. The latter is a handsome wood taking a fine polish; it is strong and very durable, and but slightly affected by moisture. It is made into furniture, agricultural implements, etc., and is used for railway-ties, piles, and similar purposes. The dust produced in working it causes sneezing (whence the name).

sneezewort (snēz'wėrt), n. [< sneeze + wort[1]. Cf. D. nieswortel, hellebore.] 1. In old usage, the white hellebore, Veratrum album, more often under the form neezewort. Britten and Holland, Eng. Plant Names.—2. A composite herb, Achillea Ptarmica, chiefly of the Old World. The flower-heads are larger and much fewer than those of the yarrow, A. Millefolium; the leaves are simple and sharply serrate, and when dried and pulverized are said to provoke sneezing (whence the name).

3. Same as sneezeweed.

sneezing (snē'zing), n. [< ME. snesynge*, earlier fnesynge, < AS. fneósung, verbal n. of fneósan, sneeze: see sneeze. Cf. neezing.] 1. The act of emitting a sneeze.

Looking against the sun doth induce sneezing.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 687.

Sneezings, masticatories, and nasals.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 363. (Latham.) sneezing-powder (snē'zing-pou″dėr), n. Snuff.

Sneezing-powder is not more frequent with the Irish than chawing arec . . . is with these savages.
Herbert, Travels, an. 1638.

sneg (sneg), v. t. A Scotch variant of snag[2].

snell[1] (snel), a. [< ME. snel, snell, < AS. snel, snell, active, strenuous, = OS. snel, snell = D. snel = MLG. snel = OHG. MHG. snel (> It. snello = Pr. isnel, irnel = OF. isnel), G. schnell, swift, quick, = Icel. snjallr, eloquent, able, bold, = Sw. snäll = ODan. snel, swift, fleet; cf. Sw. Dan. snille, genius, Dan. snild, shrewd, sagacious.] 1†. Active; brisk; nimble; spirited.

Sythyne wente into Wales with his wyes alle, Sweys into Swaldye with his snelle houndes,
For to hunt at the hartes in thas hye laundes.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 57.

2. Keen; piercing; sharp; severe; hard: as, a snell frost. [Scotch.]

There came a wind out of the north,
A sharp wind and a snell.
The Young Tamlane (Child's Ballads, I. 120).

He has unco little sympathy wi' ither folks; and he's snell and dure enough in casting up their nonsense to them.
Scott, Antiquary, xxi.

snell[2] (snel), n. [Origin obscure.] A short piece of gut, gimp, or sea-grass on which fish-hooks are tied; a snood. The best material for snells is silkworm-gut, as it is light, strong, and nearly invisible.

snell[2] (snel), v. t. [< snell[2], n.] To tie or fasten to a line or gut, as a hook for angling.

snell-loop (snel'löp), n. A particular tie made by looping a snell, used by anglers.

Charg'd with a riot.
Randolph, Muse's Looking Glass, iv. 3. (Davies.)

A fashionable snip, who had authority for calling himself "breeches-maker to H. R. H. Prince Albert," had an order to prepare some finery for the Emperor.
C. A. Bristed, English University, p. 292, note.

To go snips†, to go snacks; share.

The Gamester calls out to me to give him good Luck, and promises I shall go Snips with him in what he shall win. N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, II. 5.

snipe[1] (snīp), n.; pl. snipe or snipes (see below). [< ME. snipe, snype, < Icel. snīpa, a snipe (mȳrisnīpa, a moor-snipe); cf. Sw. snäppa, a sandpiper, = Dan. sneppe, snipe, = MD. snippe, sneppe, D. snip, snep = MLG. sneppe, snippe = OHG. snepha, snepho, snepfa, MHG. snepfe, G. schnepfe (> It. dial. sgneppa), a snipe; prob. orig. a 'snipper' or 'snapper,' from the root of snip or snap: see snip, snap.] 1. A bird of the genus Scolopax in a former broad sense. (a) Some or any bird belonging to the family Scolopacidæ, having the bill straight, much longer than the head, dilated and sensitive at the end, and with a median lengthwise groove on the upper mandible near the end, the toes cleft to the base, the primaries not emarginate, and the tail-feathers barred; especially, a member of the genus Gallinago (Scolopax being restricted to certain woodcock). In Great Britain three species of Gallinago are called snipe. (1) The common snipe, or whole snipe, is Gallinago cœlestis or G. media, formerly Scolopax gallinago. (2) The great, double, or solitary snipe, or woodcock-snipe, is G. major. (3) The small snipe, half-snipe, or jack-snipe is G. gallinula. They differ little except in size. In the United States the common snipe, also called jack-snipe and Wilson's snipe, is G. wilsoni or G. delicata, about as large as G. media, which it very closely resembles, so that it is sometimes known as the "English" snipe, to distinguish it from various snipe-like birds peculiar to America, and also bog-snipe, gutter snipe, meadow-snipe, alewife-bird, shad-bird, and shad-spirit. It is from 10½ to 11½ inches long and from 17½ to 19½ in extent of wings; the bill is about 2½ inches long. The upper parts are blackish, varied with bay and tawny; the scapulars are edged with tawny or pale buff, forming a pair of firm stripes along the sides of the back when the wings are closed; the lining of the wings and axillary feathers is barred regularly with black and white; the tail-feathers, normally sixteen in number, are barred with black, white, and chestnut; the fore neck and breast are light-brown speckled with dark-brown; and the belly is white. (See cut under Gallinago.) Snipes like these, and of the same genus, are found in most countries, and are called by the same name, with or without a qualifying term. (b) Some other scolopacine or snipe-like bird. There are very many such birds, chiefly distinguished from sandpipers (see sandpiper) by the length, from tattlers or gambets by the sensitiveness, and from curlews, godwits, etc., by the straightness of the bill. (1) In the United States the gray-backed or red-breasted snipes are birds of the genus Macrorhamphus, of which there are 2 species or varieties, the lesser and greater longbeak, M. griseus and M. scolopaceus. See dowitcher. (2) The grass-snipe is the pectoral sandpiper, Actodromas maculata. See cut under sandpiper. Also called jack-snipe. (3) The robin-snipe is the knot, Tringa canutus, also a sandpiper. (4) The stone-snipe is Totanus melanoleucus, a tattler. See cut under yellowlegs. (5) In Great Britain the sea-snipe is the dunlin, Tringa or Pelidna alpina, a sandpiper. (6) In Great Britain the summer snipe is the common sandpiper, Actitis hypoleucus. (7) Painted snipe are the curious birds of the genus Rhynchæa or Rostratula. See these words. (c) A common misnomer, in various localities, of the American woodcock, Philohela minor: also called common snipe, big snipe, mud-snipe, red-breasted snipe, big headed snipe, blind snipe, whistling snipe, wood-snipe. See woodcock. (d) A misnomer of the long-billed curlew. R. Ridgway. [Salt Lake valley.] (e) pl. The Scolopacidæ; the snipe family. [The plural means either two or more birds of one kind, or two or more kinds of these birds: in the former sense, the plural is generally snipe; in the latter, snipes.]

2. A fool; a blockhead; a simpleton; a goose.

I mine own gain'd knowledge should profane,
If I would time expend with such a snipe.
But for my sport and profit. Shak., Othello, i. 3. 391.

And, by Jove, I sat there like a great snipe face to face with him [the hushranger] as cool and unconcerned as you like. H. Kingsley, Geoffry Hamlyn, xxxi.

The literary use (def. 3) seems to have arisen from the use in the universities (def. 2), this being a contemptuous application of def. 1. In def. 4 the word is perhaps an independent abusive use of def. 1.] 1. A shoemaker; a journeyman shoemaker.

The Shoemaker, born a Snob.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 220, note.

2. A townsman as opposed to a gownsman; a Philistine. [University cant, especially in Cambridge.]

Snobs.—A term applied indiscriminately to all who have not the honour of being members of the university; but in a more particular manner to the "profanum vulgus," the tag-rag and bob-tail, who vegetate on the sedgy banks of Camus. Gradus ad Cantabrigiam (1824).

3. One who is servile in spirit or conduct toward those whom he considers his superiors, and correspondingly proud and insolent toward those whom he considers his inferiors; one who vulgarly apes gentility.

Ain't a snob a fellow as wants to be taken for better bred, or richer, or cleverer, or more influential than he really is?
Lever, One of Them, xxxix.

My dear Flunkies, so absurdly conceited at one moment, and so abject at the next, are but the types of their masters in this world. He who meanly admires mean things is a Snob—perhaps that is a safe definition of the character.
Thackeray, Book of Snobs, ii.

4. A workman who continues working while others are out on strike; one who works for lower wages than other workmen; a knobstick; a rat: so called in abuse. [Prov. Eng.]

The mod. verb snow[1] is from the noun.] 1. The aqueous vapor of the atmosphere precipitated in a crystalline form, and falling to the earth in flakes, each flake consisting of a distinct crystal, or more commonly of combinations of separate crystals. The crystals belong to the hexagonal system, and are generally in the form of thin plates and long needles or spiculæ; by their different modes of union they present uncounted varieties of very beautiful figures. The whiteness of snow is due primarily to the large number of reflecting surfaces arising from the minuteness of the crystals. When sufficient pressure is applied, the slightly adhering crystals are brought into molecular contact, and the snow, losing its white color, assumes the form of ice. This change takes place when snow is gradually transformed into the ice of a glacier. Precipitation takes the form of snow when the temperature of the air at the earth's surface is near or below the freezing-point, and the flakes are larger the moister the air and the higher its temperature. The annual depth of snowfall and the number of days on which the ground is covered with snow are important elements of climate. In a ship's log-book abbreviated s.

2. A snowfall; a snow-storm. [Colloq.]—3. A winter; hence, in enumeration, a year: as, five snows. [North Amer. Indian.]—4. Something that resembles snow, as white blossoms.

That breast of snow. Dionysius (trans.).

II. trans. 1. To scatter or cause to fall like snow.

Let it thunder to the tune of Green Sleeves, hail kissing-comfits, and snow eringoes. Shak., M. W. of W., v. 5. 21.

2. To surround, cover, or imprison with snow: with in, up, under, or over: often used figuratively. See snow-bound.

I was snowed up at a friend's house once for a week. . . . I went for only one night, and could not get away till that very day se'nnight. Jane Austen, Emma, xiii.

snow[2] (snō), n. [< MD. snauw, snau, D. snaauw, a kind of boat; prob. < LG. snau, G. dial. schnau, a snout, beak, = G. dial. schnuff, a snout: see snout.] A vessel equipped with two masts, resembling the mainmast and foremast of a ship, and a third small mast just abaft and close to the mainmast, carrying a trysail. It is identical with a brig, except that the brig bends her fore-and-aft mainsail to the mainmast, while the snow bends it to the trysail-mast. Vessels are no longer rigged in this way.

There was no order among us—he that was captain to-day was swabber to-morrow. . . . I broke with them at last for what they did on board of a bit of a snow; no matter what it was; bad enough, since it frightened me.
Scott, Redgauntlet, ch. xiv.

snow-apple (snō'ap″l), n. A variety of apple which has very white flesh.

snowball (snō'bâl), n. [< ME. snaweballe*, snayballe; < snow[1] + ball[1].] 1. A ball of snow; a round mass of snow pressed or rolled together.

The nobleman would have dealt with her like a nobleman, and she sent him away as cold as a snowball.
Shak., Pericles, iv. 6. 149.

2. The cultivated form of the shrub Viburnum Opulus; the guelder-rose. The name is from its large white balls of flowers, which in cultivation have become sterile and consist merely of an enlarged corolla. See cranberry-tree, and cut under neutral.

3. In cookery: (a) A pudding made by putting rice which has been swelled in milk round a pared and cored apple, tying up in a cloth, and boiling well. (b) White of egg beaten stiff and put in spoonfuls to float on the top of custard. (c) Rice boiled, pressed into shape in a cup, and variously served.—Wild snowball. Same as redroot, 1.

snowball (snō'bâl), v. [< snowball, n.] I. trans. To pelt with snowballs.

II. intrans. To throw snowballs.

There are grave professors who cannot draw the distinction between the immorality of drinking and snowballing. N. A. Rev., CXXVI. 433.

snowball-tree (snō'bâl-trē), n. Same as snowball, 2.

snowbank (snō'bangk), n. A bank or drift of snow.

The whiteness of sea sands may simulate the tint of old snowbanks. The Atlantic, LXVI. 597.

snowberry (snō'ber″i), n.; pl. snowberries (-iz). 1. A shrub of the genus Symphoricarpus, chiefly S. racemosus, native northward in North America. It is commonly cultivated for its ornamental, but not edible, white berries, which are ripe in autumn. The flowers are not showy, and the habit is not neat.

2. A low erect or trailing rubiaceous shrub, Chiococca racemosa, of tropical and subtropical America, entering Florida.—Creeping snowberry, an ericaceous plant, Chiogenes serpyllifolia, of northern North America. It is a slender creeping and trailing scarcely woody evergreen, with thyme-like leaves and small bright-white berries. It has the aromatic flavor of the American wintergreen.

snowbird (snō'bėrd), n. A bird associated in some way with snow. Specifically—(a) The snow-finch. (b) The snow-bunting. (c) The popular name in the United States of all the species of the genus Junco; any junco. They are small fringilline birds of a certain type of form and pattern of coloration, breeding in alpine regions and northerly localities, flocking in winter and then becoming familiar, whence the name. The common snowbird of the United States is J. hiemalis, about 6 inches long, dark slate-gray, with white belly, two or three white feathers on each side of the tail, and the bill white or pinkish-white. It inhabits North America at large, breeding in the northern United States and British America, and in mountains as far south as Georgia and Arizona. It has a sweet song in the summer, in winter only a chirp. It nests on the ground and lays speckled eggs. In many parts of the United States it appears with the first cold weather in October, and is seen until the following April, in flocks. There are numerous other species or varieties, some reaching even Central America. See Junco. (d) The fieldfare, Turdus pilaris. See cut under fieldfare. [Prov. Eng.]

snow-blind (snō′blīnd), a. Affected with snow-blindness.

snow-blindness (snō′blīnd″nes), n. Amblyopia caused by the reflection of light from the snow, and consequent exhaustion of the retina.

snow-blink (snō′blingk), n. The peculiar reflection that arises from fields of ice or snow: same as ice-blink. Also called snow-light.

snow-boot (snō′bōt), n. A boot intended to protect the feet from dampness and cold when walking in snow. Specifically—(a) A boot of waterproof material with warm lining. (b) A thick and high boot of leather, specially designed for use in snow. (c) Before the introduction of lined rubber boots, a knitted boot with double or cork sole, usually worn over another boot or a shoe.

snow-bound (snō′bound), a. Shut in by a heavy fall of snow; unable to get away from one's house or place of sojourn on account of the obstruction of travel by snow; blocked by snow, as a railway-train.

The snow-bound in their arctic hulk are glad to see even a wandering Esquimau.
C. D. Warner, Backlog Studies, p. 124.

snow-box (snō′boks), n. Theat., a device used in producing an imitation of a snow-storm.

snowbreak (snō′brāk), n. A melting of snow; a thaw.

And so, like snowbreak from the mountains, for every staircase is a melted brook. it storms, tumultuous, wild-shrilling, towards the Hôtel-de-Ville.
Carlyle, French Rev., I. vii. 4.

snow-broth (snō′brôth), n. Snow and water mixed; figuratively, very cold liquor.

A man whose blood
Is very snow-broth. Shak., M. for M., i. 4. 58.

"This is none of your snow-broth, Peggy," said the mother, "it 's warming." S. Judd, Margaret, i. 6.

snow-bunting (snō′bun″ting), n. A kind of snowbird, Plectrophanes nivalis, a bunting of the family Fringillidæ, which inhabits arctic and cold temperate regions of both hemispheres, and is chiefly white, varied with black or brown. Also called snowbird, snowflake, snowfleck, snowflight, snowfowl. In full plumage, rarely seen in the United States, the bird is pure-white, with the bill, feet, middle of back, and the wings and tail in part jet-black. In the usual plumage the white is overlaid with rich, warm brown in various places, and the black is not pure or continuous. The length is 7 inches, the extent of wings 12½. This bird is a near relative of the longspurs, as the Lapland, but has the hind claw curved, and is sometimes therefore placed in another genus (Plectrophenax). It breeds only in high latitudes, moving south in the fall in flocks, often of vast extent. It nests on the ground, lines the nest with feathers, and lays from four to six variegated eggs.

Snow-bunting (Plectrophanes nivalis), male, in breeding-plumage.

snowbush (snō′bůsh), n. One of several shrubs bearing profuse white flowers. Such are Ceanothus cordulatus of Californian mountains, Olearia stellulata of Australia and Tasmania, and Phyllanthus nivalis of the New Hebrides.

snowcap (snō′kap), n. A humming-bird of the genus Microchæra, having a snowy cap. There are two species, M. albocoronata and M. parvirostris, the former of Veragua, the latter of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, both of minute size (2½ inches long). The character of the white crown is unique among the Trochilidæ.

snow-capped (snō′kapt), a. Capped with snow.

snow-chukor (snō′chū″kor), n. [< snow[1] + chukor, a native name: see chourtka.] A kind of snow-partridge. See chourtka, 1, and snow-partridge, 2.

snow-cock (snō′kok), n. Same as snow-partridge, 2.

Snowdonian (snō-dō′ni-an), a. [< Snowdon (see def.) + -ian.] Relating to Snowdon, a mountain of Carnarvonshire, Wales.—Snowdonian series, in geol., a name given by Sedgwick to a part of the Lower Silurian or Cambrian in Wales, including what is now known as the Arenig series and the Bala beds.

snow-drift (snō′drift), n. A drift of snow; snow driven by the wind; also, a bank of snow driven together by the wind.

snowdrop (snō′drop), n. A low herb, Galanthus nivalis, a very early wild flower of European woods, often cultivated. The name is also applied, in an extended sense, to the genus. G. plicatus, the Crimean snowdrop, is larger, with broader plicate leaves. See Galanthus and purification-flower.—African snowdrop. See Royena.

snowdrop-tree (snō′drop-trē), n. 1. See Linociera.—2. See Halesia and rattlebox, 2 (c).

snow-eater (snō′ē″tėr), n. A warm, dry west wind which rapidly evaporates the snow. These winds are similar in character to Chinook winds. Science, VII. 242. [Eastern Colorado.]

snow-eyes (snō′īz), n. pl. A contrivance used by the Eskimos as a preventive of snow-blindness. It is made of extremely light wood, with a bridge resting on the nose, and a narrow slit for the passage of the light.

snowfall (snō′fâl), n. 1. The falling of snow: used sometimes of a quiet fall in distinction from a snow-storm.

Through the wavering snow-fall, the Saint Theodore upon one of the granite pillars of the Piazzetta did not show so grim as his wont is. Howells, Venetian Life, iii.

2. The amount of snow falling in a given time, as during one storm, day, or year. This amount is measured popularly by the depth of the snow at the close of each time of falling, and scientifically by melting the snow and measuring the depth of the water.

Stations reporting the largest total snow-fall, in inches, were Blue Knob, 46; Eagles Mere, 49; Grampian Hills, 33. Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXIX. 2.

snow-fed (snō′fed), a. Originated or augmented by melted snow: as, a snow-fed stream.

snow-field (snō′fēld), n. A wide expanse of snow, especially permanent snow, as in the arctic regions.

As the Deer approach, a few stones come hurtling down, as the snow-field begins to yield.
D. G. Elliot, in Wolf's Wild Animals, p. 121.

snow-finch (snō′finch), n. A fringilline bird of Europe, Montifringilla nivalis; the stone-finch or mountain-finch, somewhat resembling the snow-bunting, but of a different genus. See cut under brambling.

snowflake (snō′flāk), n. 1. A small feathery mass or flake of falling snow. See snow[1], n., 1.

Flowers bloomed and snow-flakes fell, unquestioned in her sight. Whittier, Bridal of Pennacook, iii.

2. In ornith., same as snow-bunting. Coues.—3. A plant of the genus Leucoium, chiefly L. æstivum (the summer snowflake), and L. vernum (the spring snowflake). They are European wild flowers, also cultivated, resembling the snowdrop, but larger. Of the two species the latter is smaller, and chiefly continental. The name was devised to distinguish this plant from the snowdrop, and is now commonly accepted.
4. A particular pattern of weaving certain woolen cloths, by which small knots are produced upon the face, which, when of light color, resemble a sprinkling of snow. Dict. of Needlework.

snow-flange (snō′flanj), n. A metal scraper fixed to a railroad-car, for the purpose of removing ice or snow clinging to the inside of the head of the rail.

snow-flea (snō′flē), n. Any kind of springtail or poduran which is found on the snow. Achorutes nivicola is the common snow-flea of the United States, often appearing in great numbers on the snow. See cut under springtail.

Our common snow-flea is . . . sometimes a pest where maple sugar is made, the insects collecting in large quantities in the sap. Comstock, Introd. Entom. (1888), p. 61.

snowfleck (snō′flek), n. The snow-bunting or snowflake. See cut under snow-bunting.

snowflight (snō′flīt), n. The snowflake or snow-bunting, Plectrophanes nivalis.

snow-flood (snō′flud), n. A flood from melted snow.

snowflower (snō′flou″ėr), n. 1. A variant name of the snowdrop, Galanthus.—2. Same as fringe-tree.—3. A shrub, Deutzia gracilis. See Deutzia. Miller, Dict. Eng. Names of Plants.

snow-fly (snō′flī), n. 1. A perlid insect or kind of stone-fly which appears on the snow, as Perla nivicola of Fitch. The common snow-fly of New York is Capnia pygmæa, which is black with gray hairs.
2. A neuropterous insect of the family Panorpidæ and genus Boreus, as B. nivoribundus, which appears on the snow in northerly parts of the United States. Also called springtail.—3. A wingless dipterous insect of the family Tipulidæ and genus Chionea, as C. valga, occurring under similar circumstances. Also snow-gnat.—4. A snow-gnat.—5. A snow-flea.

A paper on "Insecta nive delapsa" or "schneewürmer," . . . some one or another of the Thysanura. In America we find that these little creatures are to this day called snow-flies. E. P. Wright, Animal Life, p. 491.

snowfowl (snō′foul), n. The snow-bunting, Plectrophanes nivalis.

snow-gage (snō′gāj), n. A receptacle for catching falling snow for the purpose of measuring its amount.

snow-gem (snō′jem), n. A garden name of Chionodoxa Luciliæ. See snow-glory.

snowght, n. An old spelling of snow[1].

snow-glory (snō′glō″ri), n. A plant of the liliaceous genus Chionodoxa. Two species from Asia Minor, C. Luciliæ, sometimes called snow-gem, and C. nana, the dwarf snow-glory, are beautiful hardy garden flowers with some resemblance to squill.

snow-gnat (snō′nat), n. 1. Any one of certain gnats of the genus Chironomus found on the snow in early spring, as C. nivoriundus.—2. Same as snow-fly, 3.

snow-goggle (snō′gog″l), n. Same as snow-eyes.

Mr. Murdock, of the Point Barrow Station, . . . found an Eskimo snow-goggle beneath more than twenty feet of frozen gravel.
A. R. Wallace, Nineteenth Century, XXII. 672.

snow-goose (snō′gös), n. A goose of the genus Chen, of which the white brant, C. hyperboreus, is the best-known species, white, with black-tipped wings, the head washed with rusty-brown, and the bill pink. Also called Mexican goose, red goose, Texas goose. See wavey, and cut under Chen.—Blue or blue-winged snow-goose. See goose and wavey.

snow-grouse (snō′grous), n. A ptarmigan; any bird of the genus Lagopus, nearly all of which turn white in winter. Also snow-partridge. See cuts under grouse and ptarmigan.

Up above the timber line were snow-grouse [Lagopus leucurus] and huge hoary-white woodchucks.
T. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXVI. 210.

snow-ice (snō′īs), n. Ice formed by the freezing of slush: such ice is opaque and white, owing to the incompleteness of the melting of the snow: opposed to black ice. The word is especially used of ice thus formed in places where, without the snow, black ice would have been formed, as on a pond or a river.

snowily (snō′i-li), adv. In a snowy manner; with or as snow.

Afar rose the peaks
Of Parnassus, snowily clear.
M. Arnold, Youth of Nature.

snowiness (snō′i-nes), n. The state of being snowy, in any sense.

These last may, in extremely bright weather, give an effect of snowiness in the high lights.
Lea, Photography, p. 210.

snow-in-harvest (snō′in-här′vest), n. A mouse-ear chickweed, Cerastium tomentosum, and some other plants with abundant white flowers in summer. Britten and Holland, Eng. Plant Names. [Prov. Eng.]

snow-insect (snō′in″sekt), n. A snow-flea, snow-fly, or snow-gnat.

snow-in-summer (snō′in-sum′ėr), n. A garden name of Cerastium tomentosum. See snow-in-harvest.

snowish (snō′ish), a. [< ME. snowissh; < snow[1] + -ish[1].] Resembling snow; somewhat snowy; snow-white.

He gan to stroke; and good thrifte bad ful ofte Hire snowissh [var. snow-white] throte.
Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 1250.

Her snowish necke with blewish vaines Stood bolt vpright vpon
Her portly shoulders.
Warner, Albion's England, iv. 54.

snow-knife (snō′nīf), n. An implement used by Eskimos for scraping snow from fur garments, having the general form of a large knife, but made of morse-ivory or some similar material.

snowl (snoul), n. [Origin obscure.] The hooded merganser, Lophodytes cucullatus. See cut under merganser. G. Trumbull, 1888. [Crisfield, Maryland.] snow-leopard (snō′lep′ärd), n. The ounce, Felis uncia or irbis. See cut under ounce.

snowless (snō′les), a. [< snow[1] + -less.] Destitute of snow.

snow-light (snō′līt), n. Same as snow-blink.

snowlike (snō′līk), a. [< snow[1] + like[2].] Resembling snow.

snow-limbed (snō′limd), a. Having limbs white like snow. [Rare.]

> The snow-limb'd Eve from whom she came.
> Tennyson, Maud, xviii. 3.

snow-line (snō′līn), n. The limit of continual snow, or the line above which a mountain is continually covered with snow. The snow-line is due primarily to the decrease of the temperature of the atmosphere with increase of altitude. In general, the height of the snow-line diminishes as we proceed from the equator toward the poles; but there are many exceptions, since the position of the snow-line depends not only upon the mean temperature, but upon the extreme heat of summer, the total annual snowfall, the prevalent winds, the topography, etc. For these reasons, the snow-line is not only at different heights in the same latitude, but its position is subject to oscillation from year to year in the same locality. Long secular oscillations in the height of the snow-line are evidence of corresponding oscillations of climate. In the Alps the snow-line is at an altitude of 8,000 to 9,000 feet; in the Andes, at the equator, it is nearly 16,000 feet.

> Between the glacier below the ice-fall and the plateau above it there must exist a line where the quantity of snow which falls is exactly equal to the quantity annually melted. This is the snow-line.
> Tyndall, Forms of Water, p. 48.

snow-mouse (snō′mous), n. 1. An alpine vole or field-mouse, Arvicola nivalis, inhabiting the Alps and Pyrenees.—2. A lemming of arctic America which turns white in winter, Cuniculus torquatus. See Cuniculus, 2.

snow-on-the-mountain (snō′on-thē-moun′tān), n. 1. A white-flowered garden-plant, Arabis alpina, from southern Russia; also, Cerastium tomentosum, from eastern Europe. Britten and Holland, Eng. Plant Names. [Prov. Eng.] —2. A plant, Euphorbia marginata. T. Meehan, Native Wild Flowers of the United States. [Western U. S.]

snow-owl (snō′oul), n. The great white or snowy owl, Strix nyctea or Nyctea scandiaca, inhabiting arctic and northerly regions of both hemispheres, and having the plumage more or less white. See Nyctea, and cut under braveate.

Snow-owl (Nyctea scandiaca).

snow-partridge (snō′pär′trij), n. 1. A gallinaceous bird of the Himalayan region, Lerva (or Lerwa) nivicola. See cut under Lerva.—2. A bird of the genus Tetraogallus, as T. himalayensis. Also called snow-cock, snow-chukor, and snow-pheasant. See chouriha, partridge, and cut under Tetraogallus.—3. A ptarmigan: same as snow-grouse.

snow-pear (snō′pār), n. See pear[1].

snow-pheasant (snō′fez″ant), n. 1. Any pheasant of the genus Crossoptilon, as C. manchuricum. See eared pheasant, under pheasant.—2. Same as snow-partridge, 2.

snow-pigeon (snō′pij″on), n. A notable true pigeon, Columba leuconota, of the northwestern Himalayan region, known to some sportsmen as the imperial rock-pigeon, and found at an altitude of 10,000 feet and upward. The upper parts are mostly white, the crown and auriculars blackish, the wings brownish-gray with several dusky bars, and the tail is ashy-black with a broad grayish-white bar.

snow-planer (snō′plā″nėr), n. See planer.

snow-plant (snō′plant), n. 1. Red snow. See Protococcus.—2. See Sarcodes.

snow-plow (snō′plou), n. An implement for clearing away snow from roads, railways, etc. There are two kinds—one to be hauled by horses, oxen, etc., as on a common highway, and the other to be placed in front of a locomotive to clear the rails. A modification of the latter is adapted to street-railroads. The snow-plow for ordinary country roads usually consists of a frame of boards braced together so as to form an acute angle in front, and spread out behind to any required distance. The machine being drawn by horses harnessed to the center framework, the angular point enters the snow, a, body of plow; b, caboose for implements and workmen; c, movable wings for widening the cuttings; c′, doors which give access to leading truck for oiling, etc.; d, cupola; e, headlight; f, f, iron plates, scrapers, or shoes which remove snow from the outer margins of the track; f′, f′, adjustable aprons which clean out the snow from between the tracks flush with the wheel-flanges; g, intermediate apron; h, draw-bar for hauling the plow when not in use; i, adjustable scraper for removing hard-packed snow or ice from the inner side of the rails.

which is thrown off by the side-boards, and thus a free passage is opened for pedestrians, etc. For railway purposes, snow-plows are of various forms, adapted to the a, caboose; b, cab; c, tender; d, shoe, plate, or scraper which cuts horizontally at a level with the tops of the rails; e, auger which cuts into the snow-drift, and assists by its screw-like action to propel the machine (its centrifugal action projects the snow upward through the chute f, and laterally to a distance of 60 feet).

character of the country, the amount of snowfall, the tendency to drift, etc. Such plows vary in size from the simple plows carried on the front of an engine, resembling a cowcatcher with smooth iron sides, to heavy structures mounted on freight-car trucks, and pushed before one locomotive or more, or, as sometimes made, self-propelling. In recent forms the principle of centrifugal force has been utilized for removal of the snow. Snow-plows are often of great size, sometimes weighing fifty tons, and can be forced through very deep drifts.

snow-probe (snō′prōb), n. An instrument used by the Eskimos to probe snow and ice in searching for seals.

snow-scraper (snō′skrā″pėr), n. 1. A form of snow-plow made of two small planks and a crosspiece, like the letter A.—2. An iron scraper attached to a car or locomotive, to remove snow and ice from the rails.—3. Same as snow-knife.

snow-shed (snō′shed), n. On a railroad, a construction covering the track to prevent accumulations of snow on the line, or to carry snow-slides or avalanches over the track in mountainous regions.

snow-shoe (snō′shō), n. A contrivance attached to the foot to enable the wearer to walk on deep snow without sinking to the extent of being disabled. There are two principal kinds—the web or Canadian, and the long or Norwegian. The Canadian is a contracted oval in front and pointed behind, and is from 3 to 5 feet long and from 1 to 2 feet wide, the foot being fastened on the widest part of the shoe by means of thongs and so as to leave the heel free. It has a light rim of tough wood, on which is woven from side to side a web of rawhide. The Norwegian is merely a thin board, about 8 feet long and 3 inches wide, slightly curved upward in front; it is especially adapted to mountains, in descending which by its use great speed is attained. See skee.

Canadian Snow-shoe.

> O'er the heaped drifts of winter's moon
> Her snow-shoes tracked the hunter's way.
> Whittier, Bridal of Pennacook, iii.

Snow-shoe disease, a painful affection of the feet occurring in arctic and subarctic America after long journeys on snow-shoes.—Snow-shoe rabbit. See rabbit[1].

[< ME. snubben, snuben, < Icel. snubba, snub, chide, = Sw. snubba, clip or snub off, snobba, lop off, snuff (a candle); cf. Icel. snubbōtr, snubbed, nipped, with the tip cut off, snupra, snub, chide; akin to E. snip. Cf. snib, a var. of snub.] 1†. To cut off short; nip; check in growth; stunt.

Trees . . . whose heads and boughs I have observ'd to run out far to landward, but toward the sea to be so snubbed by the winds as if their boughs had been pared or shaven off on that side. Ray, Works of Creation, i.

2. To make snub, as the nose.

They laughed, and snubbed their noses with their handkerchiefs. S. Judd, Margaret, i. 14.

3. To check or stop suddenly; check the headway of, as a vessel by means of a rope in order to turn her into a narrow berth, or an unbroken horse in order to break him to the halter: commonly with up; also, to fasten, or tie up, as to a snub or snubbing-post.

One of the first lessons the newly caught animal has to learn is not to "run on a rope," and he is taught this by being violently snubbed up, probably turning a somersault, the first two or three times that he feels the noose settle round his neck and makes a mad rush for liberty. T. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXV. 660.

4. To discomfort; check; rebuke with a severe or sarcastic reply or remark; slight designedly; treat with deliberate neglect.

3if the brother shal synne in thee, go thou, and reproue hym, or snybbe. Wyclif, Mat. xviii. 15.

Would it not vex a Man to the Heart to have an old Fool snubbing a Body every Minute afore Company? Steele, Tender Husband, i. 1.

I did hear him say, a little snubbing before marriage would teach you to bear it the better afterwards. Goldsmith, Good-natured Man, iv.

The House of Lords, or a majority of them, about 200 men, can snub both king and House of Commons. W. R. Greg, Misc. Essays, 2d ser., p. 96.

This youth spoke his mind too openly, and moreover would not be snubbed. G. Meredith, Ordeal of Richard Feverel, xii.

5. To affect or compel in a specific way by snubbing: as, to snub one into silence.

"Deborah, there 's a gentleman sitting in the drawing-room with his arm round Miss Jessie's waist!" . . . Miss Jenkyns snubbed her down in an instant: "The most proper place in the world for his arm to be in. Go away, Matilda, and mind your own business." Mrs. Gaskell, Cranford, ii.

To snub a cable (naut.), to check it suddenly in running out.

snub[1] (snub), n. [See snub[1], v. t.] 1. A protuberance or knot in wood.

And lifting up his dreadfull club on hight,
All armd with ragged snubbes and knottie graine.
Spenser, F. Q., I. viii. 7.

2. A nose turned up at the tip and somewhat flat and broad; a pug-nose.

My father's nose was aquiline, and mine is a snub. Marryat.

3. A check; a rebuff; a rebuke; an intentional slight.

They [the porphyrogeniti] seldom forget faces, and never miss an opportunity of speaking a word in season, or administering a snub in season, according to circumstances. H. N. Oxenham, Short Studies, p. 13.

4. The sudden checking of a rope or cable running out.—5. A stake, set in the bank of a river or canal, around which a rope may be cast to check the motion of a boat or raft. [U. S. and Canada.]

snub[1] (snub), a. [< snub[1], n.] Somewhat broad and flat, with the tip turned up: said of the nose.

Her nose was unformed and snub, and her lips were red and dewy. Mrs. Gaskell, Cranford, i.

3. To smell; especially, to smell curiously or doubtfully.

Have, any time this three years, snuffed about
With your most grovelling nose.
B. Jonson, Volpone, v. 1.

A sweet-breath'd cow,
Whose manger is stuff'd full of good fresh hay, Snuffs at it daintily, and stoops her head
To chew the straw, her litter, at her feet.
M. Arnold, Balder Dead.

4. To take snuff into the nose. Compare to dip snuff, under dip, v. t.

Although snuffing yet belongs to the polite of the present day, owing perhaps to the high workmanship and elegance of our modern gold snuff-boxes. J. Nott, Note in Dekker's Gull's Hornbook.

snuff[1] (snuf), n. [< snuff[1], v.] 1. Inhalation by the nose; a sniff; also, a pinch of snuff.

I will enrich . . . thy nose with a snuff from my mull, and thy palate with a dram from my bottle of strong waters, called, by the learned of Gandercleugh, the Dominie's Dribble o' Drink. Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, Prol.

2†. Smell; scent; odor.

The Immortal, the Eternal, wants not the snuff of mortal incense for his, but for our sakes. Stukeley, Palæographia Sacra, p. 93. (Latham.)

3. Offense; resentment; huff, expressed by a sniffing.

Jupiter took snuff at the contempt, and punished him. Sir R. L'Estrange.

4. A powdered preparation of tobacco taken into the nostrils by inhalation. It is made by grinding, in mortars or mills, the chopped leaves and stalks of tobacco in which fermentation has been induced by moisture and warmth. The tobacco is well dried previous to grinding, and this is carried sometimes so far as to give the peculiar flavor of the high-dried snuffs, such as the Irish, Welsh, and Scotch. Some varieties, as the rappees, are moist. The admixture of different flavoring agents and delicate scents has given rise to fanciful names for snuffs, which, the flavor excepted, are identical. Dry snuffs are often adulterated with quicklime, and the moist kinds with ammonia, hellebore, pearl-ash, etc.

Thou art properly my cephalick snuff, and art no bad medicine against megrims, vertigoes, and profound thinking. Colman and Garrick, Clandestine Marriage, iv.

Among these [the English gentry], the mode of taking the snuff was with pipes of the size of quills, out of small spring boxes. These pipes let out a very small quantity of snuff upon the back of the hand, and this was snuffed up the nostrils. J. Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, I. 208.

5. In therap., any powder with medicinal properties to be snuffed up into the nose.—Cephalic snuff, an errhine powder composed of asarabacca (7 parts) and dried lavender-flowers (1 part); also, a powder of equal parts each of dried tobacco-leaves, marjoram-leaves, and lavender-leaves.—Ferrier's snuff, a snuff for nasal catarrh, composed of morphine hydrochlorate, powdered acacia, and bismuth subnitrate.—To dip snuff. See dip.—To take a thing in snuff†, to be offended at it; take offense at it.

Who therewith angry, when it next came there, Took it in snuff. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 3. 41.

For, I tell you true, I take it highly in snuff to learn how to entertain gentlefolks of you, at these years. B. Jonson, Poetaster, ii. 1.

Up to snuff, knowing; sharp; wide-awake; not likely to be deceived. [Slang.]

Lady A., who is now what some call up to snuff, Straight determines to patch
Up a clandestine match.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 295.

snuff[2] (snuf), v. t. [< ME. snuffen, snuff (a candle) (cf. snoffe, the snuff of a candle): perhaps a var. of snuppen*, snoppen*, > E. dial. snop, crop, as cattle do young shoots: see snop, and cf. snub[1].] To crop the snuff of, as a candle; take off the end of the snuff from.

If it be necessarie in one houre three or four times to snuffe the candel, it shall not be ouermuch that euery weeke, at the leaste, once or twice to purge and snuffe the soule. Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 355.

This candle burns not clear; 'tis I must snuff it;
Then out it goes. Shak., Hen. VIII., iii. 2. 95.

To snuff out, to extinguish by snuffing; hence, figuratively, to put an end to suddenly and completely: as, my hopes were quickly snuffed out.

'Tis strange the mind, that very fiery particle,
Should let itself be snuff'd out by an article.
Byron, Don Juan, xi. 60.

To snuff pepper†, to take offense. Halliwell.

snuff[2] (snuf), n. [< ME. snuffe, snoffe, snof; < snuff[2], v.] 1. The burning part of a candle- or lamp-wick, or the part which has been charred by the flame, whether burning or not.

The snoffes ben quenched. Wyclif, Ex. xxv. 38 (earlier version).

There lives within the very flame of love
A kind of wick or snuff that will abate it.
Shak., Hamlet, iv. 7. 115.

Like snuffs that do offend, we tread them out.
Massinger, Duke of Milan, v. 1.

2. A candle almost burnt out, or one having a heavy snuff. [Rare.]

Lamentable! What,
To hide me from the radiant sun, and solace
I' the dungeon by a snuff?
Shak., Cymbeline, i. 6. 87.

5. An over-stocking, with or without a foot, worn over the long stocking for warmth or protection from dirt. Compare boot-hose, stirrup-hose.—To put in soak, to put in pawn; pawn; pledge: as, to put one's rings in soak. [Slang.]

soakage (sō'kāj), n. [< soak + -age.] The act of soaking; also, that which soaks; the amount of fluid absorbed by soaking.

The entire country from Gozersjup to Cassala is a dead flat. . . . There is no drainage upon this perfect level; thus, during the rainy season, the soakage actually melts the soil. Sir S. W. Baker, Heart of Africa, i.

It shall be ruiable to allow soakage to cover the moisture absorbed by the package from its contents as follows, etc.
New York Produce Exchange Report, 1888–9, p. 806.

soak-barrel (sōk'bar'el), n. A barrel in which fresh fish are put to soak before salting.

soaker (sō'kėr), n. [< soak + -er[1].] One who or that which soaks. (a) That which steeps, wets, or drenches, as a rain.

Well, sir, suppose it's a soaker in the morning, . . . then may be, after all, it comes out a fine day.
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 314.

(b) A habitual drinker; one accustomed to drink spirituous liquors to excess; a toper. [Colloq.]

By a good natur'd man is usually meant neither more nor less than a good fellow, a painful, able, and laborious soaker. South, Sermons, VI. iii.

The Sun's a good Pimple, an honest soaker; he has a Cellar at your Antipodes. Congreve, Way of the World, iv. 10.

soak-hole (sōk'hōl), n. A space marked off in a stream, in which sheep are washed before shearing. [Australia.]

Parallel poles, resting on forks driven into the bed of the waterhole, were run out on the surface of the stream, forming square soak-holes, a long narrow lane leading to the dry land. A. C. Grant, Bush Life in Queensland, I. 82.

soaking (sō'king), n. [< ME. sokynge; verbal n. of soak, v.] 1. A steeping; a wetting; a drenching.

Sokynge, or longe lyynge in lycure. Infusio, inbibitura. Prompt. Parv., p. 463.

Few in the ships escaped a good soaking.
Cook, Second Voyage, i. 1.

2. Intemperate and continual drinking. Compare soak, v. i., 4. [Colloq.]

soakingly (sō'king-li), adv. As in soaking; hence, little by little; gradually.

A mannes enemies in battail are to be ouercomed with a carpenter's squaring axe—that is to say, soakingly, one pece after an other.
Udall, tr. of Apophthegms of Erasmus.

soaking-pit (sō'king-pit), n. A pit in which steel ingots are placed immediately after casting, in order that the mass may acquire a uniform temperature, the interior of such ingots remaining for some time after casting too hot to roll satisfactorily. These pits are generally known as "Gjers soaking-pits," from the name of the metallurgist who first introduced them into use.

soaky (sō'ki), a. [Also dial. soeky; < soak + -y[1]. Cf. soggy.] 1. Moist on the surface; steeped in water; soggy.—2. Effeminate. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

soam[1] (sōm), n. [Origin obscure.] 1. A chain for attaching the leading horses to a plow. It is supported by a hanger beneath the clevis, in order to preserve the line of draft and avoid pulling down the nose of the plow-beam. E. H. Knight.

2. A short rope used to pull the tram in a coal-mine. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

so-and-so (sō'and-sō), n. Some one or something not definitely named: commonly representing some person or thing in an imaginary or supposed instance: as, Mrs. So-and-so; was he wrong in doing so-and-so? Compare so[1], adv., 5.

soap (sōp), n. [Early mod. E. also sape; < ME. sope, soope, sape, < AS. sāpe = MD. sepe, D. zeep = MLG. sēpe, LG. sepe = OHG. seifa, seipha, seipfa, soap, MHG. G. seife, G. dial. seipfe = Icel. sāpa = Sw. såpa = Dan. sæbe (Icel., etc., < AS.), soap; cf. L. sapo, pomade for coloring the hair (Pliny: see def. 2), LL. ML. soap (> Gr. σάπων = It. sapone = Sp. jabon = Pg. sabão = Pr. sabo = F. savon (> Turk. sabun) = W. sebon = Ir. siabunn = Gael. siopunn, soap), prob. < Teut., the true L. cognate being prob. sebum, tallow, grease (see sebum, sebaceous). Cf. Finn. saippio, < Teut. The word, if orig. Teut., is prob. identical with AS. sāp = OHG. seifa, resin, and connected with AS. sīpan, sipian,* LG. sipen, MHG. sīfen, trickle, and perhaps with AS. sæp, etc., sap: see sæp, sipe, sap[1].] 1. A chemical compound in common domestic use for washing and cleansing, made by the union of certain fatty acids with a saliñable base. Fats and fixed oils consist of fatty acids combined with glycerin. On treating them with a strong base, like potash or soda, glycerin is set free, and the fatty acid combines with the strong base and forms a soap. Soap is of two kinds—soluble soap, in which the base is potash, soda, or ammonia, and insoluble soap, whose base is an earth or a metallic oxid. Only the soluble soaps dissolve readily in water and have detergent qualities. Insoluble soaps are used only in pharmacy for liniments or plasters. Of the fats, stearates make the hardest, oleates the softest soaps; and of the bases, soda makes the hardest and least soluble, and potash the softest and most soluble. Perfumes are occasionally added, or various coloring matters are stirred in while the soap is semi-fluid. White soaps are generally made of olive-oil and soda. Common household soaps are made chiefly of soda and tallow. Yellow soap is composed of tallow, rosin, and soda, to which some palm-oil is occasionally added. (See rosin-soap.) Mottled soap is made by simply adding mineral and other colors during the manufacture of ordinary hard soap. Marine soap, known as salt-water soap, which has the property of dissolving as well in salt water as in fresh, is made of palm- or cocoanut-oil and soda. Soft soaps are made with potash, instead of soda, and whale-, seal-, or olive-oil, or the oils of linseed, hemp-seed, rape-seed, etc., with the addition of a little tallow. Excellent soaps are made from palm-oil and soda. A solution of soap in alcohol, with camphor and a little essential oil added to scent it, forms a soft ointment called opodeldoc, now superseded by soap-liniment, a similar preparation, which is liquid. Medicinal soap, when pure, is prepared from caustic soda and either olive- or almond-oil. It is chiefly employed to form pills of a gently aperient antacid action.

2†. A kind of pomade for coloring the hair. [Only as a translation of the Latin.]—3. Smooth words; persuasion; flattery: more often called soft soap. [Slang.]

> He and I are great chums, and a little soft soap will go a long way with him.
> T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Oxford, xxxiii. (Davies.)

4. Money secretly used for political purposes. [Political slang, U. S.]

Soap.—Originally used by the Republican managers during the campaign of 1880, as the cipher for "money" in their telegraphic dispatches. In 1884 it was revived as a derisive war cry aimed at the Republicans by their opponents. Mag. of Amer. Hist., XIII. 394.

Almond-oil soap, a soap made of sodium hydrate and almond-oil. Also called amygdaline soap.—Arsenical soap, a saponaceous preparation used in taxidermy to preserve skins from natural decay and from the attacks of insects. There are many kinds, all alike consisting in the impregnation of some kind of soap with arsenious acid or commercial arsenic.—Beef's-marrow soap, a soap of soda and animal oil.—Boiled soap. Same as grained soap.—Bone soap, a soap made from cocoanut-oil mixed with jelly from bones.—Butter soap, soap made from soda and butter; sapo butyricus.—Calcium soap, a soap made either directly by saponifying fat with hydrate of lime, or by treating soluble soap with a solution of a salt of lime. It is used in the manufacture of stearin wax.—Carbolic soap, a disinfectant soap containing 1 part of carbolic acid to 9 parts of soap.—Castile soap, a hard soap composed of soda and olive-oil, of two varieties: (1) white Castile soap, which contains 21 per cent. of water, is of a pale grayish-white color, giving no oily stains to paper, free from rancid odor, and entirely soluble in alcohol or water; and (2) marbled Castile soap, which is harder and more alkaline, contains 14 per cent. of water, and has veins or streaks of ferruginous matter running through it. Formerly also, erroneously, castle-soap; also Spanish soap.

> Roll but with your eyes
> And foam at the mouth. A little castle-soap
> Will do't, to rub your lips.
> B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, v. 3.

Curd soap, soap made from soda and a purified animal fat consisting largely of stearin.—Fulling-soap, a soap used in fulling cloth composed of 124 parts of soap, 54 of clay, and 110 of calcined soda-ash.—German soft soap. Same as green soap.—Glass-makers' soap. Same as glass-soap.—Grained soap, soap remelted and worked over for toilet purposes.—Green soap, an officinal preparation of soft soap, made from potash and linseed- or hempseed-oil, colored by indigo, and used in the treatment of eczema and other cutaneous diseases.—Gum soap, a soap prepared from potash and fixed oils.—Marine soap. See def. 1.—Olive-oil soda-soap. Same as Castile soap.—Quicksilver soap†. See quicksilver plaster, under quicksilver.—Silicated soap. See silicated.—Soap of guaiac, soap composed of liquor potassæ and guaiac.—Soft soap. (a) A liquid soap, especially a soap made with potash as a base; so called because it does not harden into cakes, but remains semi-fluid or ropy. The softest soap is made from potash lye and olive-oil or fats rich in oleic acid. (b) See def. 3.—Spaniah soap. Same as Castile soap.

> Some may present thee with a pounde or twaine
> Of Spanishe soape to washe thy lynnen white.
> Gascoigne, Councell to Master Withipoll.

Starkey's soap, a soap made by triturating equal parts of potassium carbonate, oil of turpentine, and Venice turpentine.—Transparent soap, a soap made of soda and kidney-fat, dried, then dissolved in alcohol, filtered, and evaporated in molds.—Venice soap, a mottled soap made of olive-oil and soda, with a small quantity of iron or zinc sulphate in solution. Simmonds.—Windsor soap, a scented soap made of soda with olive-oil 1 part and tallow 9 parts.—Zinc soap, a soap obtained by the double decomposition of zinc sulphate and soap, or by saponifying zinc white with olive-oil or fat. It is used as an oil-color, as an ointment, and as zinc plaster.

soap (sōp), v. t. [< soap, n.] 1. To rub or treat with soap; apply soap to.

> Belia soaped his face and rubbed his face, and soaped his hands and rubbed his hands, and splashed him and rinsed him and toweled him, until he was as red as beet-root. Dickens, Our Mutual Friend, iv. 5.

2. To use smooth words to; flatter. [Slang.]

> These Dear Jacks soap the people shameful, but we Cheap Jacks don't. We tell 'em the truth about themselves to their faces, and scorn to court 'em.
> Dickens, Doctor Marigold.

soap-apple (sōp'ap″l), n. Same as soap-plant.

soap-ashes (sōp'ash″ez), n. pl. Ashes containing lye or potash, and thus useful in making soap.

> So drugs and sweet woods, where they are, cannot but yield great profit; soap ashes likewise, and other things that may be thought of. Bacon, Plantations (ed. 1887).

soap-balls (sōp'bâlz), n. pl. Balled soap, made by dissolving a soap in a little hot water, mixing it with starch, and then molding the mixture into balls. The starch acts upon the skin as an emollient.

soap-bark, soap-bark tree (sōp'bärk, -trē). See quillai and Pithecolobium.

soap-beck (sōp'bek), n. In a dye-house, a vessel filled with a solution of soap in water.

soapberry (sōp'ber″i), n.; pl. soapberries (-iz). The fruit of one of several species of Sapindus; also, any of the trees producing it, and, by extension, any member of the genus. The fruit of the proper soapberries so abounds in saponin as to serve the purpose of soap. That of S. Saponaria, a small tree of South America, the West Indies, and Florida, is much used in the West Indies for cleansing linen, etc., and is said to be extremely efficacious, though with frequent use deleterious to the fabric. Its roots also contain saponin. Its hard black seeds are made up into rosaries and necklaces, and sometimes have been used as buttons. In the East Indies the fruit of S. trifoliatus appears to have been used as a detergent from remote times. The pulp is regarded also as astringent, anthelmintic, and tonic, and the seeds yield a medicinal oil. The wood is made into combs and other small articles. This species is sometimes called Indian filbert, translating the Mohammedan name. S. (Dittelasma) Rarak, of Cochin-China, etc., has also a detergent property. The wood of S. acuminatus (S. marginatus), of the southern United States, etc., is hard and strong, easily split into strips, and in the southwest much used for making cotton-baskets and the frames of pack-saddles. Its berries are reddish-brown, of the size of a cherry, with a soapy pulp. Also called wild china-tree (which see, under china-tree). The fruit of some species yields an edible pulp, though the seed is poisonous. Another name, especially of S. trifoliatus, is soapnut.

soap-boiler (sōp'boi″lèr), n. 1. A maker of soap.

> The new company of gentlemen soapboilers have procured Mrs. Sanderson, the Queen's laundress, to subscribe to the goodness of the new soap.
> Court and Times of Charles I., II. 230.

2. That in which soap is boiled or made; a soap-pan. Imp. Dict.

soap-boiling (sōp'boi″ling), n. The business of boiling or manufacturing soap.

soap-bubble (sōp'bub″l), n. A bubble formed from soapy water; especially, a thin spherical film of soap-suds inflated by blowing through a pipe, and forming a hollow globe which has often beautiful iridescent colors playing over the surface.

> One afternoon he was seized with an irresistible desire to blow soap-bubbles. . . . Behold him, therefore, at the arched window, with an earthen pipe in his mouth! . . . Behold him scattering airy spheres abroad, from the window into the street. Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xi.

soap-bulb (sōp'bulb), n. Same as soap-plant.

soap-cerate (sōp'sē″rāt), n. An ointment composed of soap-plaster (2 parts), yellow wax (2¼ parts), and olive-oil (4 parts).

soap-coil (sōp'koil), n. A coiled pipe fitted to the inside of a soap-boiling kettle, through which hot steam is circulated to boil the contents of the kettle.

soap-crutch (sōp'kruch), n. A staff or rod with a crosspiece at one end, formerly used in crutching or stirring soap.

soap-crutching (sōp'kruch″ing), n. The process of crutching or stirring soap in kettles.—Soap-crutching machine, an apparatus for mixing soap. It consists of a vertical cylinder in which are numerous spiral wings and an upright shaft with radial arms, to which a rotary motion is communicated by gearing. When the tank is filled with soap, the spiral wings act like screws, carrying up the heavier part of the materials toward the top, and thoroughly intermixing the whole.

soap-earth (sōp'érth), n. Soapstone or steatite.

soap-engine (sōp'en″jin), n. A machine upon which slabs of soap are piled to be crosscut into bars. Weale.

soaper (sō'pèr), n. [Early mod. E. also soper; < ME. sopare; < soap + -er[1].] A soap-maker; a dealer in soap. [Obsolete or provincial.]

> Sopers and here sones for seluer han be knyghtes.
> Piers Plowman (C), vi. 72.

soap-fat (sōp'fat), n. Fatty refuse laid aside for use in the making of soap.

soap-fish (sōp'fish), n. A serranoid fish of the genus Rhypticus (or Promicropterus): so called from the soapy skin. Several are found along the Atlantic coast of the United States, as R. maculatus, R. decoratus, and R. pituitosus. See cut under Rhypticus.

soap-frame (sōp'frām), n. A series of square frames locked together, designed to hold soap while solidifying, preparatory to its being cut into bars or cakes.

> The interior width of soap-frames corresponds to the length of a bar of soap, and the length of a frame is equal to the thickness of about twenty bars of soap.
> Watt, Soap-making, p. 20.

soap-glue (sōp'glö), n. A gelatinous mass resulting from the boiling together of tallow and lye.

soap-house (sōp'hous), n. A house or building in which soap is made.

soapiness (sō'pi-nes), n. The state or quality of being soapy. Bailey, 1727.

soap-kettle (sōp'ket″l), n. A soap-boiler.

soapless (sōp'les), a. [< soap + -less.] Lacking soap; free from soap; hence, unwashed.

> He accepted the offered hand of his new friend, which . . . was of a marvellously dingy and soapless aspect.
> Bulwer, Pelham, xiix.

soap-liniment (sōp'lin″i-ment), n. A liniment composed of soap (10 parts), camphor (5), oil of rosemary (1), alcohol (70), and water (14): an anodyne and rubefacient embrocation.

soap-lock (sōp'lok), n. A lock of hair worn on the temple and kept smoothly in place by being soaped; hence, any lock brushed apart from the rest of the hair, and carefully kept in position. [U. S.]

> As he stepped from the cars he . . . brushed his soap-locks forward with his hand. The Century, XXXVI. 249.

soap-maker (sōp'mā″kèr), n. A manufacturer of soap.

soap-making (sōp'mā″king), n. The manufacture of soap; soap-boiling.

soap-mill (sōp'mil), n. 1. A machine for cutting soap into thin shavings, preparatory to drying it, and as a step toward fitting it for grinding.—2. A mill for grinding dry soap, in the manufacture of bath-soap and other soap powders.

soapnut (sōp'nut), n. 1. Same as soapberry.—2. The fruit of an East Indian climbing shrub, Acacia concinna; also, the plant itself. The long flat pods have a saponaceous property, and are much used in Bombay as a detergent, especially in a wash for the head. They are also used as a deobstruent and expectorant and in jaundice. Also soap-pod.

soap-pan (sōp'pan), n. In the manufacture of soap, a large pan or vessel, generally of cast-iron, in which the ingredients are boiled to the desired consistence.

> The soap-pan or copper (or, as the French and Americans term it, kettle) is sometimes made of cast-iron, in several divisions, united together by iron cement.
> Watt, Soap-making, p. 17.

soap-plant (sōp'plant), n. One of several plants whose bulbs serve the purpose of soap; particularly, the Californian Chlorogalum pomeridianum, of the lily family. It is a stout brownish plant, from 1 to 3 feet high, with long linear leaves and a spreading panicle of white flowers. The bulb, which is from 1 to 4 inches thick, when divested of its coat of dark-brown fibers, produces, if rubbed on wet cloth, a thick lather, and is often substituted for soap. Also called soap-apple and soap-bulb, and, together with some plants of a similar property, by the Mexican name amole. Zygadenus Fremontii, also Californian, is another soap-plant.—Indian soap-plant, a name ascribed to the soapberry Sapindus acuminatus, and to the Chlorogalum.

soap-plaster (sōp'plās″tèr), n. A plaster composed of curd soap (10 ounces), yellow wax (12½ ounces), olive-oil (1 pint), oxid of lead (15 ounces), and vinegar (1 gallon).

soap-pod (sōp'pod), n. 1. One of the legumes of several Chinese species of Cæsalpinia; also, the plant itself. The legumes are saponaceous, and are employed by the Chinese as a substitute for soap.—2. Same as soapnut, 2.

soaproot (sōp′rōt), n. 1. A Spanish herb, Gypsophila Struthium, whose root contains saponin. Also called Egyptian or Spanish soaproot. —2. A Californian bulbous plant, Leucocrinum montanum, of the lily family, bearing white fragrant flowers close to the ground in early spring. Soaproot is used by the Digger Indians to take trout. At the season of the year when the streams run but little water, and the fish collect in the deepest and widest holes, they cut off the water above such holes in the stream, and put soaproot rubbed to a lather into the holes, which soon causes the fish in the holes to float stupefied on the surface.

soapstone (sōp′stōn), n. A variety of steatite (see talc); specifically, a piece of such stone used when heated for a griddle, a foot-warmer, or other like purpose.

He . . . fished up a disused soapstone from somewhere, put it on the stove that was growing hot for the early baking, and stood erect and patient — like a guard — till the soapstone was warm. The Century, XL. 531.

soap-suds (sōp′sudz′), n. pl. A solution of soap in water stirred till it froths; froth of soapy water.

Phib Cook left her evening wash-tub, and appeared at her door in soap-suds . . . and general dampness.
George Eliot, Janet's Repentance, iv.

soap-tree (sōp′trē), n. The soapberry-tree Sapindus Saponaria. See soapberry.

soapweed (sōp′wēd), n. A plant, Agave heteracantha, or some other species of the samo genus. See amole.

soapwood (sōp′wůd), n. A West Indian timber-tree or shrub, Clethra tinifolia.

soap-works (sōp′wėrks), n. sing. or pl. A place or building for the manufacture of soap.

The high price of potash, and the diminished price as well as improved quality of the crude sodas, have led to their general adoption in soap-works. Ure, Dict., III. 846.

soapwort (sōp′wėrt), n. 1. A plant of the genus Saponaria, chiefly S. officinalis. It is a smooth perennial herb, a rather stout rambling plant a foot or two high, bearing white or pinkish flowers, native in Europe and western Asia, and running wild from gardens in America. Its leaves and roots abound in saponin; they produce a froth when rubbed in water, and are useful as a cleansing agent. They can be employed with advantage, it is said, in some final processes of washing silk and wool, imparting a peculiar gloss without injuring the most sensitive color. (Also called bouncing-bet, fuller's herb, and by many other names. See cut under petal.) S. Vaccaria (Vaccaria vulgaris), the cow-herb, also contains saponin. S. cæspitosa, S. Calabrica, and S. ocymoides are finer European species desirable in culture.

The Upper Part of the Stem with Flowers of Soapwort (Saponaria officinalis).

2. Any plant of the order Sapindaceæ. Lindley. —Soapwort-gentian. See gentian.

soapy (sō′pi), a. 1. Consisting of or containing soap; resembling soap; having some of the properties of soap; saponaceous.

All soaps and soapy substances . . . resolve solids, and sometimes attenuate or thin the fluids.
Arbuthnot, On Diet, i.

2. Smeared with soap: as, soapy hands.

Our soapy laundresses. Randolph, Conceited Peddler.

3. Belonging to or characteristic of soap: as, a soapy taste; a soapy feeling.

The backgrounds to all these figures have been scraped off, leaving a soapy light color.
The Century, XXXVII. 672.

4. Smooth-tongued; unctuous; plausible; flattering. [Slang.]

soar[1] (sōr), v. i. [Early mod. E. also sore; < ME. soren, sooren, < OF. essoreir, essorer, F. essorer, lay out, mount, or soar, dial. essourer, air clothes, = Pr. essaureiar, eisaurar = It. sorare, soar, < LL. exaurare*, expose to the air, formed < L. ex, out, + aura, a breeze, the air: see aura[1].] 1. To mount on wings, or as on wings, through the air; fly aloft, as a bird or other winged creature; specifically, to rise and remain on the wing without visible movements of the pinions. The specific mode of flight is specially distinguished from any one in which the wings are flapped to beat the air; but the term soaring is also loosely applied to any light, easy flight to a great height with little advance in any other direction, whatever be the action of the wings, as of a skylark rising nearly vertically from the ground. In the case of heavy-bodied, short-winged birds which fly up thus, the action is often specified as rocketing or towering (see these verbs). A kind of swift wayward soaring, as of the swallow, is often called skimming. Soaring specifically so called, or sailing on the air, is best shown in the flight of long-winged birds, whether their wings be either narrow and sharp, or ample and blunt, as the albatross, frigato, and some other sea-birds, storks, cranes, and some other large waders, turkey-buzzards and other vultures, eagles, kites, and some other large birds of prey. It is capable of being indefinitely protracted, either on a horizontal plane, or at a considerable inclination upward, at least in some cases; but most birds which soar to a higher level without beating the wings take a spiral course, mounting as much as they can on that part of each lap which is against the wind, and this action is usually specified as gyrating or circling.

So have I seen a lark rising from his bed of grass, and soaring upwards, singing as he rises, and hopes to get to heaven, and climb above the clouds.
Jer. Taylor, Sermon, The Return of Prayers, ii.

2. To mount or rise aloft; rise, or seem to rise, lightly in the air.

Flames rise and sink by fits; at last they soar
In one bright blaze, and then descend no more.
Dryden.

He could see at once the huge dark shell of the cupola, the slender soaring grace of Giotto's campanile, and the quaint octagon of San Giovanni in front of them.
George Eliot, Romola, iii.

We miss the cupola of Saint Cyriacus soaring in triumph above the triumphal monument of the heathen.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 73.

3. To float, as at the surface of a liquid. [Rare.]

'Tis very likely that the shadow of your rod . . . will cause the Chubs to sink down to the bottom with fear; for they be a very fearful fish, . . . but they will presently rise up to the top again, and lie there soaring till some shadow affrights them again.
I. Walton, Complete Angler (ed. 1653), p. 53.

4. To rise mentally, morally, or socially; aspire beyond the commonplace or ordinary level.

How high a pitch his resolution soars!
Shak., Rich. II., i. 1. 109.

But know, young prince, that valour soars above
What the world calls misfortune and affliction.
Addison, Cato, ii. 4.

In every age the first necessary step towards truth has been the renunciation of those soaring dreams of the human heart which strive to picture the cosmic frame as other and fairer than it appears to the eye of the impartial observer. Lotze, Microcosmus (trans.), I., Int., p. vii.

soar[1] (sōr), n. [< soar[1], v.] 1. The act of soaring, or rising in the air.

The churches themselves [of Rome] are generally ugly. . . . There is none of the spring and soar which one may see even in the Lombard churches.
Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 306.

2. The height attained in soaring; the range of one who or that which soars. [Rare.]

Within soar
Of towering eagles, to all the fowls he seems A phœnix. Milton, P. L., v. 270.

soc, n. See soke[1].

Soc. An abbreviation of Society.

socage, soccage (sok′āj), n. [< OF. socage (ML. socagium); as soc + -age.] In law, a tenure of lands in England by the performance of certain determinate service: distinguished both from knight-service, in which the render was uncertain, and from villeinage, where the service was of the meanest kind: the only freehold tenure in England after the abolition of military tenures. Socage has generally been distinguished into free and villein—free socage, or common or simple socage, where the service was not only certain but honorable, as by fealty and the payment of a small sum, as of a few shillings, in name of annual rent, and villein socage, where the service, though certain, was of a baser nature. This last tenure was the equivalent of what is now called copyhold tenure.

In socage land—the land, that is, which was held by free tenure, but without military service—the contest between primogeniture and gavel-kind was still undecided in the thirteenth century. F. Pollock, Land Laws, p. 57.

Guardianship in socage, a guardianship at common law as an incident to lands held by socage tenure. It occurs where the infant is seized, by descent, of lands or other hereditaments holden by that tenure, and is conferred on the next of kin to the infant who cannot possibly inherit the lands from him. Minor.—Socage roll, the roll of those holding under socage tenure—that is, within a soke. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 475 (gloss.).

Such then was the root and foundation of the sociability of religion in the ancient world, so much envied by modern Pagans. Warburton, Divine Legation, ii. 1.

The true ground [of society] is the acceptance of conditions which came into existence by the sociability inherent in man, and were developed by man's spontaneous search after convenience. J. Morley, Rousseau, II. 183.

sociable (sō′shia-bl), a. and n. [< F. sociable = Sp. sociable = Pg. sociavel = It. sociabile, < L. sociabilis, sociable, < sociare, associate, join, accompany: see sociate.] I. a. 1†. Capable of being conjoined; fit to be united in one body or company.

Another law there is, which toucheth them as they are sociable parts united into one body; a law which bindeth them each to serve unto other's good.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, i. 3.

2. Disposed to associate or unite with others; inclined to company; of social disposition; social; of animals, social.

Society is no comfort
To one not sociable. Shak., Cymbeline, iv. 2. 13.

3. Disposed to be friendly and agreeable in company; frank and companionable; conversible.

This Macilente, signior, begins to be more sociable on a sudden, methinks, than he was before.
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, iv. 6.

4†. Friendly: with reference to a particular individual.

Is the king sociable,
And bids thee live? Beau. and Fl.

The sociable and loving reproof of a Brother.
Milton, Reformation in Eng., i.

5. Affording opportunities for sociability and friendly conversation.

I will have no little, dirty, second-hand chariot now furbished, but a large, sociable, well-painted coach.
Wycherley, Gentleman Dancing-Master, v. 1.

6. Characterized by sociability and the absence of reserve and formality: as, a sociable party.—7. Of, pertaining to, or constituting society; social. [Rare.]

His divine discourses were chiefly spent in pressing men to exercise those graces which adorn the sociable state.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. x.

Sociable weaver or weaver-bird. See weaver-bird, and cuts under Philetærus and hive-nest. =Syn. 2 and 3. Social, Sociable, friendly, communicative, familiar. So far as social and sociable are like in meaning, sociable is the stronger and more familiar. They may differ in that social may express more of the permanent character, and sociable the temporary mood: man is a social being, but is not always inclined to be sociable.

II. n. 1. An open four-wheeled carriage with seats facing each other.

They set out on their little party of pleasure; the children went with their mother, to their great delight, in the sociable. Miss Edgeworth, Belinda, xlx.

2. A tricycle with seats for two persons side by side.

A sociable is a wide machine having two seats, side by side. This style of cycle has been used in Europe for wedding trips. Tribune Book of Sports, p. 454.

3. A kind of couch or chair with a curved S-shaped back, and seats for two persons, who sit side by side and partially facing each other. Also called vis-à-vis.—4. A gathering of people for social purposes; an informal party; especially, a social church meeting. [U. S.]

Their wildest idea of dissipation was a church sociable, or a couple of tickets to opera or theater.
The Century, XL. 272.

sociableness (sō′shia-bl-nes), n. [< sociable + -ness.] Sociable character or disposition; inclination to company and social intercourse; sociability. Bailey, 1727.

sociably (sō′shia-bli), adv. In a sociable manner; with free intercourse; conversibly; familiarly. Bailey, 1727.

social (sō′shal), a. [= F. social = Sp. Pg. social = It. sociale = G. social, < L. socialis, of or belonging to a companion or companionship or association, social, < socius, a companion, fellow, partner, associate, ally, as an adj. partaking, sharing, associated, < sequi, follow: see sequent.] 1. Disposed to live in companies; delighting in or desirous of the company, fellowship, and coöperation of others: as, man is a social animal.—2. Companionable; sociable; ready to mix in friendly relations or intercourse with one's fellows; also, characteristic of companionable or sociable persons: as, social tastes; a man of fine social instincts.

Withers, adieu! yet not with thee remove Thy martial spirit or thy social love!
Pope, Epitaph on Withers.

He [King John] was of an amiable disposition, social and fond of pleasure, and so little jealous of his royal dignity that he mixed freely in the dances and other entertainments of the humblest of his subjects.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 23.

3. Of or pertaining to society, or to the community as a body: as, social duties, interests, usages, problems, questions, etc.; social science.

Thou in thy secresy, although alone,
Best with thyself accompanied, seek'st not Social communication. Milton, P. L., viii. 429.

To love our neighbour as ourselves is such a fundamental truth for regulating human society that by that alone one might determine all the cases in social morality.
Locke.

We could right pleasantly pursue
Our sports in social silence too.
Scott, Marmion, iv., Int.

Emerson is very fair to the antagonistic claims of solitary and social life. O. W. Holmes, Emerson, xi.

4. In zoöl.: (a) Associating together; gregarious; given to flocking; republican; sociable: as, social ants, bees, wasps, or birds. (b) Colonial, aggregate, or compound; not simple or solitary: as, the social ascidians; social polyps. See Sociales.—5. In bot., noting species of plants, as the common ragweed (Ambrosia trifida), in which the individuals grow in clumps or patches, or often cover large tracts to the exclusion of other species. Species of sage-brush, the common white pine and other conifers forming extensive forests, species of seaweed, etc., are social.—Social ascidians. See Sociales and Clavellinidæ.—Social bees, the Apidæ, including the hive-bees: distinguished from solitary bees, or Andrenidæ. See Socialinæ.—Social contract, or original contract. See contract.—Social democracy, the principles of the Social Democrats; the scheme or system of social and democratic reforms proposed and aimed at by the Social Democrats of Germany and elsewhere; the party of the Social Democrats.—Social Democrat, a member of a socialistic party founded in Germany in 1863 by Ferdinand Lassalle, whose ultimate object is the abolition of the present forms of government and the substitution of a socialistic one in which labor interests shall be supreme, land and capital shall both belong to the people, private competition shall cease, its place being taken by associations of working-men, production shall be regulated and limited by officers chosen by the people, and the whole product of industry shall be distributed among the producers. For the present its members content themselves with the promotion of measures for the amelioration of the condition of the working classes, such as shortening the hours of labor, forbidding the employment of children in factories, and higher education for all. Social Democrats are now found in many of the countries of Europe, as well as in the United States. Since the fusion of the Lassalle and Marx groups of socialists in 1875, the social-democratic party in Germany has had remarkable development.—Social dynamics, that branch of sociology which treats of the conditions of the progress of society from one epoch to another. See sociology.—Social operation of the mind, an operation of the mind involving intercourse with another intelligent being. Reid.—Social sanction. See sanction.—Social science, the science of all that relates to the social condition, the relations and the institutions which are involved in man's existence and his well-being as a member of an organized community. It concerns itself more especially with questions relating to public health, education, labor, punishment of crime, reformation of criminals, pauperism, and the like. It thus deals with the effect of existing social forces and their result on the general well-being of the community, without directly discussing or expounding the theories or examining the problems of sociology, of which it may be considered as a branch.—Social statics, that branch of sociology which treats of the conditions of the stability or equilibrium of the different parts of society or the theory of the mutual action and reaction of contemporaneous social phenomena on each other, giving rise to what is called social order.—Social war, in Rom. hist., the war (90–88 B. C.) in which the Italian tribes specially termed the allies (socii) of the Roman state fought for admission into Roman citizenship. In the end the allies virtually obtained all they strove for, though at the expense of much bloodshed. Also called the Marsic war, from the Marsi, who took a leading part in the movement.—Social wasps, the Vespidæ, including hornets or yellowjackets, which build large papery nests inhabited by many individuals. See cuts under hornet, Polistes, and wasp.—The social evil. See *evil*1.=Syn. See sociable.

social-democratic (sō′shal-dem-ō-krat′ik), a. Of or pertaining to the Social Democrats; characterized by or founded on the principles of the social democracy: as, social-democratic agitation.—Social-democratic party. Same as social democracy (which see, under social).

Sociales (sō-si-ā′lēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. socialis, sociable, social.] A group of social ascidians, corresponding to the family Clavellinidæ.

Socialinæ (sō″si-a-lī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < L. socialis, social, + -inæ.] A subfamily of the family Apidæ, including the genera Bombus and Apis, the species of which live in communities; the social bees. Each species is composed of three classes of individuals—males, females, and workers. They have the power of secreting wax, from which their cells are made, and the larvæ are fed by the workers, whose legs are furnished with corbiculæ or pollen-baskets. See cuts under Apidæ, bumblebee, and corbiculum.

socialisation, socialise. See socialization, socialize.

socialism (sō′shal-izm), n. [= F. socialisme = Sp. Pg. socialismo = G. socialismus; as social + -ism.] Any theory or system of social organization which would abolish, entirely or in great part, the individual effort and competition on which modern society rests, and substitute for it coöperative action, would introduce a more perfect and equal distribution of the products of labor, and would make land and capital, as the instruments and means of production, the joint possession of the members of the community. The name is used to include a great variety of social theories and reforms which have more or less of this character.

What is characteristic of socialism is the joint ownership by all the members of the community of the instruments and means of production; which carries with it the consequence that the division of the produce among the body of owners must be a public act performed according to rules laid down by the community. Socialism by no means excludes private ownership of articles of consumption. J. S. Mill, Socialism.

Socialism, . . . while it may admit the state's right of property over against another state, does away with all ownership, on the part of members of the state, of things that do not perish in the using, or of their own labor in creating material products.
Woolsey, Communism and Socialism, p. 7.

Christian socialism, a doctrine of somewhat socialistic tendency which sprang up in England about 1850, and flourished under the leadership of Charles Kingsley, Frederick D. Maurice, Thomas Hughes, and others. The main contentions of its advocates were (1) that Christianity should be directly applied to the ordinary business of life, and that in view of this the present system of competition should give place to coöperative associations both productive and distributive, where all might work together as brothers; (2) that any outer change of the laborer's life, as aimed at in most socialistic schemes, would not suffice to settle the labor question, but that there must be an inner change brought about by education and elevation of character, especially through Christianity; and (3) that the aid of the state should not be invoked further than to remove all hostile legislation. A similar scheme appeared somewhat earlier in France. The doctrines of Christian socialism, or similar doctrines under the same name, have been frequently advocated in the United States.—Professorial socialism. Same as socialism of the chair.—Socialism of the chair, a name (first used in ridicule in 1872 by Oppenheim, one of the leaders of the National Liberals) for the doctrines of a school of political economy in Germany which repudiated the principle of laissez-faire, adopted in the study of political economy the historical method (which see, under historical), and strove to secure the aid of the state in bringing about a better distribution of the products of labor and capital, especially to bring to the laborer a larger share of this product, and to elevate his condition by means of factory acts, savings-banks, sanitary measures, shortening of the hours of labor, etc.

socialist (sō′shal-ist), n. and a. [= F. socialiste = Sp. Pg. socialista = G. socialist; as social + -ist.] I. n. One who advocates socialism.

A contest who can do most for the common good is not the kind of competition which Socialists repudiate.
J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., II. i. § 3.

Christian socialist, a believer in, or an advocate of, the doctrines of Christian socialism. See socialism.—Professorial socialist. Same as socialist of the chair.—Socialist of the chair, a believer in, or an advocate of, socialism of the chair. See socialism.

II. a. Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of socialism or its advocates; relating to or favoring socialism: as, a socialist writer.

It must be remembered that in a socialist farm or manufactory each labourer would be under the eye, not of one master, but of the whole community.
J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., II. i. § 3.

socialistic (sō-sha-lis′tik), a. [< socialist + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of the socialists; based on the principles of socialism: as, socialistic schemes; socialistic legislation.

Socialistic troubles of close bonds
Betwixt the generous rich and grateful poor.
Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, viii.

The general tendency is to regard as socialistic any interference with property undertaken by society on behalf of the poor, the limitation of the principle of laissez-faire in favour of the suffering classes, radical social reform which disturbs the present system of private property as regulated by free competition. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 205.

socialistically (sō-sha-lis′ti-kal-i), adv. In a socialistic manner; in accordance with the principles of socialism.

sociality (sō-shi-al′i-ti), n. [= F. socialité = It. socialità, < L. socialita(t-)s, fellowship, sociality, < socialis, social: see social.] 1. The character of being social; social quality or disposition; sociability; social intercourse, or its enjoyment.—2. The impulses which cause men to form society. Sociality, in this sense, is a wider term than sociability, which embraces only the higher parts of sociality. The latter is a philosophical word, while the former is common in familiar language.

Sociality and individuality, . . . liberty and discipline, and all the other standing antagonisms of practical life.
J. S. Mill, Liberty, ii.

socialization (sō″shal-i-zā′shon), n. [< socialize + -ation.] The act of socializing, or the state of being socialized; the act of placing or establishing something on a socialistic basis. Also spelled socialisation.

It was necessary in order to bring about the socialisation of labour which now we see.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLII. 643.

socialize (sō′shal-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. socialized, ppr. socializing. [< social + -ize.] 1. To render social.

The same forces which have thus far socialised mankind must necessarily, in Mr. Spencer's view, go on to make the world a happier and better one.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 128.

2. To form or regulate according to the theories of socialism.

Also spelled socialise.

socially (sō′shal-i), adv. In a social manner or way: as, to mingle socially with one's neighbors. Latham.

socialness (sō′shal-nes), n. Social character or disposition; sociability or sociality. Bailey, 1727.

sociatet (sō′shi-āt), v. i. [< L. sociatus, pp. of sociare, join, associate, accompany, < socius, partaking, associated, as a noun a companion, fellow: see social. Cf. associate.] To associate.

They seem also to have a very great love for professors that are sincere; and, above all others, to desire to sociate with them, and to be in their company.
Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 254.

sociatet (sō′shi-āt), n. [< L. sociatus, pp.: see the verb.] An associate.

Fortitude is wisdom's sociate.
Middleton, Solomon Paraphrased, vi.

As for you, Dr. Reynolds, and your sociates, how much are ye bound to his majesty's clemency!
Fuller, Church Hist., X. i. 22.

sociative (sō′shiā-tiv), a. [< sociate + -ive.] Expressing association, coöperation, or accompaniment. [Rare.]

The pure dative, the locative, and the instrumental (including the sociative).
Trans. Amer. Philol. Ass., XVII. 79.

societarian (sō-sī-e-tā′ri-an), a. [< societary + -an.] Of or pertaining to society.

The all-sweeping besom of societarian reformation.
Lamb, Decay of Beggars.

societary (sō-sī′e-tā-ri), a. [= F. sociétaire; as societ-y + -ary.] Of or pertaining to society; societarian. [Rare.]

A philosopher of society, in search of laws that measure and forces that govern the aggregate societary movement.
N. A. Rev., CXXXIX. 18.

society (sō-sī′e-ti), n.; pl. societies (-tiz). [< F. société = Pr. societat = Sp sociedad = Pg. sociedade = It. società, < L. societa(t-)s, companionship, society, < socius, sharing, partaking, associated, as a noun a companion, fellow: see social.] 1. Fellowship; companionship; company: as, to enjoy the society of the learned; to avoid the society of the vicious.

Hol. I beseech your society.
Nath. And thank you, too; for society, saith the text, is the happiness of life. Shak., L. L. L., iv. 2. 167.

The sentiments which beautify and soften private society. Burke, Rev. in France.

2†. Participation; sympathy.

If the partie die in the eueninq, they weepe all night with a high voice, calling their neighbors and kinred to society of their griefe. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 847.

The meanest of the people, and such as have least society with the acts and crimes of kings.
Jer. Taylor. (Imp. Dict.)

3. Those persons collectively who are united by the common bond of neighborhood and intercourse, and who recognize one another as associates, friends, and acquaintances.—4. An entire civilized community, or a body of some or all such communities collectively, with its or their body of common interests and aims: with especial reference to the state of civilization, thought, usage, etc., at any period or in any land or region.

Although society and government are thus intimately connected with and dependent on each other, of the two society is the greater. J. C. Calhoun, Works, I. 5.

Among philosophical politicians there has been spreading the perception that the progress of society is an evolution. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 117.

Specifically—5. The more cultivated part of any community in its social and intellectual relations, interests, and influences; in a narrow sense, those, collectively, who are recognized as taking the lead in fashionable life; those persons of wealth and position who profess to act in accordance with a more or less artificial and exclusive code of etiquette; fashionable people in general: as, he is not received into society. In this sense frequently used adjectively: as, society people; society gossip; a society journal.

Society became interested, and opened its ranks to welcome one who had just received the brevet of "Man of Letters." Hayward, Letters, I. ii. (Encyc. Dict.)

These envied ladies have no more chance of establishing themselves in society than the benighted squire's wife in Somersetshire, who reads of their doings in the Morning Post. Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xxxvii.

As to society in 1837, contemporary commentators differ. For, according to some, society was always gambling, running away with each other's wives, causing and committing scandals, or whispering them: the men were spendthrifts and profligates, the women extravagant and heartless. W Besant, Fifty Years Ago, p. 110.

6. An organized association of persons united for the promotion of some common purpose or object, whether religious, benevolent, literary, scientific, political, convivial, or other; an association for pleasure, profit, or usefulness; a social union; a partnership: a club: as, the Society of Friends; the Society of the Cincinnati; a sewing society; a friendly society.

In this sense the Church is always a visible society of men; not an assembly, but a society.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iii. 1.

It is now near two hundred years since the Society of Quakers denied the authority of the rite altogether, and gave good reasons for disusing it.
Emerson, The Lord's Supper.

Specifically—7. In eccles. law, in some of the United States, the corporation or secular body organized pursuant to law with power to sue and be sued, and to hold and administer all the temporalities of a religious society or church, as distinguished from the body of communicants or members united by a confession of faith. When so used in this specific sense, members of the society are those who are entitled under the law to vote for trustees—usually adults who have been stated attendants for one year and have contributed to the support of the organization according to its usages, while members of the church are those who have entered into a religious covenant with one another. To a considerable extent both bodies are the same persons acting in different capacities. Under the law in some jurisdictions, and in some denominations in all jurisdictions, there is no such distinction.—Amalgamated societies. See amalgamate.—Bible, building, coöperative, etc., society. See the qualifying words.—Dorcas Society, an association of women organized for the supply of clothes to the poor: named from the Dorcas mentioned in Acts ix. 36. Frequently the members of the society meet at stated times and work in common. Partial payment is generally required from all except the very poorest recipients.—Emigrant aid societies. See emigrant.—Fruit-bringing Society. Same as Order of the Palm (which see, under palm[2]).—Guaranty society. See guaranty.—Harmony Society. See Harmonist, 4.—Red-Cross Society, Ribbon Society, etc. See the adjectives.—Society hands, in printing, workmen who belong to a trade society, and work under its rules. [Eng.]—Society houses, in printing, offices that conform to the rules of a trade society. [Eng.]—Society journal or newspaper, a journal which professes to chronicle the doings of fashionable society.—Society of the Perfectibilists. Same as Order of the Illuminati (which see, under Illuminati).—Society screw. See screw[1].—Society verse, verse concerned with the lighter society topics; poetry of a light, entertaining, polished character.—The Societies. See Cameronian, 1.= Syn. 1. Corporation, fraternity, brotherhood.—6 and 7. Union, league, lodge.

socii, n. Plural of socius.

Socinian (sō-sin′i-an), a. and n. [= Sp. Pg. It. Sociniano, < NL. Socinianus, < Socinus (It. Sozzini): see def.] I. a. Pertaining to Lælius or Faustus Socinus or their religious creed.

II. n. One who holds to Socinian doctrines. See Socinianism.

Socinianism (sō-sin′i-an-izm), n. [< Socinian + -ism.] The doctrines of the Italian theologians Lælius Socinus (1525–62) and Faustus Socinus (1539–1604) and their followers. The term is in theological usage a general one, and includes a considerable variety of opinion. The Socinians believe that Christ was a man, miraculously conceived and divinely endowed, and thus entitled to honor and reverence, but not to divine worship; that the object of his death was to perfect and complete his example and to prepare the way for his resurrection, the necessary historical basis of Christianity; that baptism is a declarative rite merely, and the Lord's Supper merely commemorative; that divine grace is general and exerted through the means of grace, not special and personally efficacious; that the Holy Spirit is not a distinct person, but the divine energy; that the authority of Scripture is subordinate to that of the reason; that the soul is pure by nature, though contaminated by evil example and teaching from a very early age; and that salvation consists in accepting Christ's teaching and following his example. The Socinians thus occupy theologically a midway position between the Arians, who maintain the divinity of Jesus Christ, but deny that he is coequal with the Father, and the Humanitarians, who deny his supernatural character altogether.

Socinianize (sō-sin′i-an-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. Socinianized, ppr. Socinianizing. [< Socinian + -ize.] To render Socinian in doctrine or belief; tinge or tincture with Socinian doctrines; convert to Socinianism. Also spelled Socinianise.

I cannot be ordained before I have subscribed and taken some oaths. Neither of which will pass very well, if I am ever so little Popishly inclined or Socinianis'd.
Tom Brown, Works, I. 4. (Davies.)

sociogeny (sō-shi-oj′e-ni), n. [< L. socius, a companion (see social), + Gr. -γένεια, production: see -geny.] The science of the origin or genesis of society.

sociography (sō-shi-og′ra-fi), n. [< L. socius, a companion, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] The observing and descriptive stage of sociology. O. T. Mason, Smithsonian Report, 1881, p. 501.

sociologic (sō″shi-ō-loj′ik), a. [< sociology + -ic.] Same as sociological.

sociological (sō″shi-ō-loj′i-kal), a. [< sociologic + -al.] Of or pertaining to sociology, or sociologic principles or matters: as, sociological studies or observations.

sociologically (sō″shi-ō-loj′i-kal-i), adv. As regards sociology; with reference to sociology.

sociologist (sō-shi-ol′ō-jist), n. [< sociolog-y + -ist.] One who treats of or devotes himself to the study of sociology. J. S. Mill.

sociology (sō-shi-ol′ō-ji), n. [< L. socius, a companion, + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science of social phenomena; the science which investigates the laws regulating human society; the science which treats of the general structure of society, the laws of its development, the progress of civilization, and all that relates to society.

The philosophical student of sociology assumes as data the general and undisputed facts of human nature, and with the aid of all such concrete facts as he can get from history he constructs his theory of the general course of social evolution—of the changes which societies have undergone, or will undergo, under given conditions.
J. Fiske, Evolutionist, p. 198.

socionomy (sō-shi-on′ō-mi), n. [< L. socius, a companion, + Gr. νόμος, law: see nome[5].] The deductive and predictive stage of sociology. O. T. Mason, Smithsonian Report, 1881, p. 501.

socius (sō′shi-us), n.; pl. socii (-ī). [NL., < L. socius, a companion, associate: see social.] An associate; a member or fellow, as of a sodality, an academy, or an institution of learning. [Archaic.]

socius criminis (sō′shi-us krim′i-nis). [L.: socius, a sharer, a partner (see social); criminis, gen. of crimen, fault, offense: see crime.] In law, an accomplice or associate in the commission of a crime.

sock[1] (sok), n. [< ME. socke, sokke, sok, < AS. socc = OFries. sokka = MD. socke, D. sok = OHG. soc, soch, MHG. soc, G. socke = MLG. socke = Icel. sokkr = Sw. socka = Dan. sokke, a sock, = F. socque, a clog, = Pr. soc = Sp. zueco, zoco = Pg. socco, a clog, = It. socco, half-boot, < L. soccus, a light shoe or slipper, buskin, sock. Hence socket.] 1. A light shoe worn by the ancient actors of comedy; hence, comedy, in distinction from tragedy, which is symbolized by the buskin.

Where be the sweete delights of learnings treasure,
That wont with Comick sock to beautefie
The painted Theaters?
Spenser, Tears of the Muses, l. 176.

Then to the well-trod stage anon,
If Jonson's learned sock be on,
Or sweetest Shakespeare, Fancy's child,
Warble his native wood-notes wild.
Milton, L'Allegro, l. 132.

2. A knitted or woven covering for the foot, shorter than a stocking; a stocking reaching but a short distance above the ankle.

Hii weren sockes in here shon, and felted botes above.
Political Songs (ed. Wright), p. 330.

3†. A sandal, wooden patten, or clog for the feet, worn by the friars called Recollets. E. Phillips, 1706.

sock[2] (sok), n. [Early mod. E. also socke, sucke = MD. sock, < OF. soc, F. dial. so, soie, sou (ML. soccus), a plowshare, < Bret. souc'h, soc'h = Gael. soc = W. swch = Corn. soch, a plowshare, a snout.] A plowshare; a movable share slipped over the sole of a plow.

sock[3]† (sok), v. t. [Origin obscure.] To sew up.

Needels wherwith dead bodies are sowne or sockt into their sheets. R. Scot, Discoverie of Witchcraft (N. and Q., [6th ser., XI. 268).

The same needles thrust into their pillows
That sews and socks up dead men in their sheets.
Middleton, The Witch, i. 2.

sock[4]†, n. Same as soke[1].

sock[5] (sok), v. t. [Perhaps abbr. from sockdologer.] 1. To throw; especially, to hurl or send with swiftness and violence: as, to sock a ball. Wright. [Prov. or colloq.]—2. To hit hard; pitch into: as, to sock one in the eye. [Slang.]—3. With an impersonal it, to strike a hard blow; give a drubbing: as, sock it to him! [Slang.]

sock[6] (sok), n. A dialectal form of sog.

sockdologer (sok-dol′o-jėr), n. [Also sockdolager, socdolager, sogdologer; a perversion of doxology, taken in the sense of 'the finishing act,' in allusion to the customary singing of the doxology at the close of service.] 1. A conclusive argument; the winding up of a debate; a settler.—2. A knock-down or decisive blow.—3. Something very big; a whopper.

Fit for an Abbot of Theleme, . . .
The Pope himself to see in dream
Before his fenten vision gleam,
He lies there, the sogdologer!
Lowell, To Mr. John Bartlett, who had sent me a seven-[pound trout.

4. A patent fish-hook having two hooked points which close upon each other as soon as the fish bites, thus securing the fish with certainty. [U. S. slang in all uses.]

socket (sok′et), n. [< ME. soket, soketc, < OF. soket, dim. of soc*, m., sochc, souche, F. souche, f., = It. zocco, m., a stump or stock of a tree; same as F. socque = Sp. zoco = Pg. soco, socco, a sock, wooden shoe, clog, < L. soccus, a sock, shoe: see sock[1]. Cf. socle.] 1. An opening or cavity into which anything is fitted; any hollow thing or place which receives and holds something else.

Another pyece wherin the sokette or morteys was maade that the body of the crosse stood in.
Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 155.

My eyes burn out, and sink into their sockets.
Fletcher, Wife for a Month, iv. 4.

The head [of the statue] seems to have been of another piece, there being a socket for it to go in, and probably it was of a more costly material.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. ii. 74.

Specifically—2. A small hollow tube or depression in a candlestick to hold a candle. Also called nozle.

Item, j. candilstik, withoute sokettes, weiyng xviij. unces.
Paston Letters, I. 473.

There was a lamp of brasse, with eight socketts from the middle stem, like those we use in churches.
Evelyn, Diary, Aug. 19, 1641.

3. In anat., specifically, the hollow of one part which receives another; the concavity or excavation of an articulation: as, an eye-socket; the socket of the hip.—4. In mining, the end of a shot-hole, when this remains visible after the shot has been fired.—5. In well-boring, a tool with various forms of gripping mechanism, for seizing and lifting tools dropped in the tube.—6. In the just, a defense of steel attached to the saddle, and serving to protect the legs and thighs. Compare burʳ, 3 (c). Also socquette.—Ball and socket. See *ball*¹.

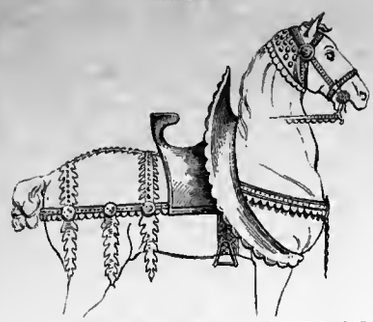
G, glenoid fossa or socket.



Socket, French form, end of 14th century. (From Viollet-le-Duc's "Dict. du Mobilier français.")

socket (sok'et), v. t. [< socket, n.] To provide with or place in a socket.

socket-bayonet (sok'et-bā″ō-net), n. A bayonet of modern type, in which a short cylinder fits outside the barrel of the gun.

socket-bolt (sok'et-bōlt), n. In mach., a bolt that passes through a thimble placed between the parts connected by the bolt.

socket-caster (sok'et-kȧs″tėr), n. A caster attached to a socket which is fitted over the end of a leg of a piece of furniture.

socket-celt (sok'et-selt), n. A celt with a socket into which the handle or haft is fitted, as distinguished from celts of those forms in which the handle is secured to the outside of the head.

socket-chisel (sok'et-chiz″el), n. A chisel having a hollow tang in which the handle is inserted. The form is used for heavy chisels employed especially in mortising.

socket-drill (sok'et-dril), n. A drill for countersinking or enlarging a previously drilled hole. It has a central projection which fits the drilled hole, and laterally projecting cutting edges which enlarge or countersink the hole.

socketed (sok'et-ed), p. a. 1. Provided with or placed in a socket.

Two whyte marble colums or pillers, soccated in two foote stepps of black marble well polished.
Archæologia, X. 404.

Referring to drainage, we read of socketed pipes which are uncemented at the joints. Lancet, 1889, II. 915.

2. In anat., received in a socket; articulated by reception in a socket.

socket-joint (sok'et-joint), n. A ball-and-socket joint; an enarthrodial articulation, or enarthrosis, as those of the shoulder and hip.

Socket-pipe.
a, length of socket-pipe; b, branch-piece; c, connecting piece; d, elbow.

socket-pipe (sok'et-pīp), n. A joint of pipe with a socket at one end, usually intended to receive the small end of another similar joint.

socket-washer (sok'et-wosh″ėr), n. A washer with a countersunk face to receive the head of a bolt, etc.; a cup-washer. E. H. Knight.

socket-wrench (sok'et-rench), n. A wrench for turning nuts, having a socket fitted to a special size and shape of nut to be turned. See cut under wrench.

sockhead (sok'hed), n. A stupid fellow. [Prov. Eng.]

sockless (sok'les), a. [< *sock*¹, n., + -less.] Lacking socks; hence, without protection or covering: said of the feet.

You shall behold one pair [of legs], the feet of which were in times past sockless.
Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, i. 3.

sockman, n. See socman.

socky (sok'i), a. See soaky.

socle (sō'kl), n. [Also zocle; = G. Sw. sockel = Dan. sokkel, < F. socle, a plinth, pedestal, < It. zoccolo, formerly soccolo, a plinth, a wooden shoe, formerly also a stilt, < L. socculus, dim. of soccus, a light shoe, sock: see *sock*¹. Cf. socket.] 1. In arch., a low, plain member, serving as a foundation for a wall or pedestal, or to support vases or other ornaments. It differs from a pedestal in being without base or cornice, and is higher than a plinth. A continued socle is one extending around a building or part of a building.

2. One of the ridges or elevations which support the tentacles and sense-bodies of some worms.

socman (sok'man), n. [Also sockman, sokeman; repr. AS. sōcmān* (ME. socheman, ML. sokmannus, socomannus, socamannus, socmannus, sockemannus), a feudal tenant or vassal, < sōc, the exercise of judicial power, + man: see *soke*¹ and soken.] One who holds lands or tenements by socage.

A seignorie of pillage, which had a baron of old ever ventured to arrogate, burgess and citizen, socman and bocman, villein and churl, would have burned him alive in his castle. Bulwer, My Novel, xii. 19.

socmanry (sok'man-ri), n.; pl. socmanries (-riz). [< ML. socmanaria, < socmannus, sokmannus, etc., < AS. sōcman: see socman.] Tenure by socage.

These tenants . . . could not be compelled (like pure villeins) to relinquish these tenements at the lord's will, or to hold them against their own: "et ideo," says Bracton, "dicuntur liberi." Britton also, from such their freedom, calls them absolutely sokemans, and their tenure sokemanries. Blackstone, Com., II. vi.

Socotran (sok'ō-tran), a. and n. [< Socotra (see def.) + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Socotra, an island in the Indian Ocean, off the east coast of Africa.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Socotra. Also Socotrine.

Socotrine (sok'ō-trin), a. and n. [< Socotra (see Socotran) + *-ine*¹.] Same as Socotran.—Socotrine aloes. See aloes, 1.

socquette, n. Same as socket, 6.

Socratic (sō-krat'ik), a. and n. [= F. Socratique = Sp. Socrático = Pg. It. Socratico, < L. Socraticus, < Gr. Σωκρατικός, of or pertaining to Socrates, < Σωκράτης, Socrates.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the methods, style, doctrine, character, person, or followers of the illustrious Athenian philosopher Socrates (about 470–399 B. C.). His father, Sophroniscus, was a sculptor, and he was brought up to the same profession. His mother, Phænarete, was a midwife. Socrates was unjustly accused before the council of the prytanes of being a corrupter of youth and of not believing in the gods of the city, was condemned, and died by drinking hemlock. His philosophy is known to us by the account of Xenophon, written to show the practical upshot of his teachings and the injustice of his sentence, and by the Dialogues of Plato, in most of which Socrates is introduced only to give an artistic setting to Plato's own discussions. Some things can also be inferred from fragments of Æschines, and from the doctrines of other companions of Socrates. He wrote nothing, but went about Athens frequenting some of the best houses, and followed by a train of wealthy young men, frequently cross-questioning those teachers whose influence he distrusted. He himself did not profess to be capable of teaching anything, except consciousness of ignorance; and he bargained for no pay, though he no doubt took moderate presents. He called his method of discussion (the Socratic method) obstetries (see maieutic), because it was an art of inducing his interlocutors to develop their own ideas under a catechetical system. He put the pretentions to shame by the practice of Socratic irony, which consisted in sincerely acknowledging his own defective knowledge and professing his earnest desire to learn, while courteously admitting the pretensions of the person interrogated, and in persisting in this attitude until examination made it appear bitter sarcasm. He was opposed to the rhetorical teaching of the sophists, and had neither interest nor confidence in the physical speculations of his time. The center of his philosophy, as of all those which sprang directly or indirectly from his—that is to say, of all European philosophy down to the rise of modern science—was morality. He held that virtue was a species of knowledge; really to know the right and not to do it was impossible, hence wrong-doers ought not to be punished; virtue was knowledge of the truly useful. He was far, however, from regarding pleasure as the ultimate good, declaring that if anything was good in itself, he neither knew it nor wished to know it. The great problems he held to consist in forming general conceptions of the nature of truth, happiness, virtue and the virtues, friendships, the soul, a ruler, a suit of armor—in short, of all objects of interest. These conceptions were embodied in definitions, and these definitions were framed by means of analytic reflection upon special instances concerning which all the world were agreed. He would not allow that anything was known for certain concerning which competent minds opined differently. This process of generalization, the Socratic induction, together with the doctrine of the necessity of definitions, were his two contributions to logic. The disciples of Socrates were Plato, Euclides, Phædo, Antisthenes, Aristippus, Xenophon, Æschines, Simonias, Cebes, and about twenty more. Properly speaking, there was no Socratic school; but the Academy and the Megarian, Elean, Eretrian, Cynic, and Cyrenaic schools are called Socratic, as having been founded by immediate disciples of Socrates.—Socratic school. See *school*¹.

II. n. A disciple of Socrates: as, Æschines the Socratic.

Socratical (sō-krat'i-kal), a. [< Socratic + -al.] Socratic in some sense, or to some extent. [Rare.]

Socratically (sō-krat'i-kal-i), adv. In the Socratic manner; by the Socratic method.

Socraticism (sō-krat'i-sizm), n. [< Socratic + -ism.] A Socratic peculiarity, absurdity, or the like. Encye. Brit., VIII. 579.

Socratism (sok'ra-tizm), n. [< Socrates + -ism.] The doctrines or philosophy of Socrates. Imp. Dict.

Socratist (sok'ra-tist), n. [< Socrates + -ist.] A disciple of Socrates; one who uses the Socratic method; a Socratic.

Socratize (sok'ra-tīz), v. i.; pret. and pp. Socratized, ppr. Socratizing. [< Socrates + -ize.] To use the Socratic method. [Rare.]

"What is to prevent me from Sokratizing?" was the question by which he [Ramus] established his individual right to doubt and inquiry.
J. Owen, Evenings with Skeptics, I. 255.

sod¹ (sod), n. [< ME. sod, sodde = OFries. sātha, sāda = MD. sode, soode, socde, soeuwe, soye, D. zode, zoo; = MLG. sōde, LG. sode = G. sode, sod, turf: so called as being sodden or saturated with water; a deriv. or particular use of OFries. sāth, sād = MD. sode, later sood, zoo = MLG. sōd, LG. sood = MHG. sōt, sōd, boiling, seething, also a well, = AS. seáth, a well, pit, < scóthan (pret. seáth, pp. soden), etc., boil, seethe: see seethe, *sodden*¹, etc.] 1. The upper stratum of grass-land, containing the roots of grass and the other herbs that may be growing in it; the sward or turf.

Tender blue-bells, at whose birth
The sod scarce heaved. Shelley, The Question.

To rest beneath the clover sod.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, x.

2. A piece of this grassy stratum pared or pulled off; a turf; a divot or fail.

She therefore, to encourage hir people against the enimies, mounted vp into an high place raised vp of turfes and sods made for the nonce.
Holinshed, Hist. Eng., iv. 10.

Sod kiln, a lime-kiln made by excavating the earth in the form of a cone, filling with alternate layers of fuel and broken limestone, and covering the top with sods to prevent loss of heat. Sometimes the sides are lined with sods.—The old sod, one's native country: especially used by Irish emigrants: as, he's a clever lad from the old sod. [Colloq.]

sod¹ (sod), v. t.; pret. and pp. sodded, ppr. sodding. [< *sod*¹, n.] To cover with sod; turf.

The slope was sodded and terraced with rows of seats, and the spectators looked down upon the circular basin at the bottom. Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 558.

sod²†. An obsolete preterit and past participle of seethe.

soda (sō'dȧ), n. [= F. Sp. Pg. D. G. Sw. Dan. soda (NL. soda), < It. soda, soda, OIt. soda (= OF. soulde), saltwort, glasswort, fem. of sodo, contr. of solido, solid, hard: see solid.] 1. Sesquicarbonate or normal carbonate of sodium (Na_2CO_3); soda-ash: the latter being the common name of the commercial article, one of the most, if not the most, important of all the products of chemical manufacture. Various hydrated carbonates of sodium occur in nature—the decahydrate or natron; the monohydrate, known as thermonatrite; and trona, a compound of the sesquicarbonate and the bicarbonate with three equivalents of water. These natural carbonates occur in solution in the water of various alkaline lakes, or as deposits at the bottoms of such as have become dried up, but usually mixed with more or less common salt, sodium sulphate, and other saline combinations. It was from these deposits, and from the incineration of various plants growing by the sea-shore (Salsola, Salicornia, Chenopodium, Statice, Reaumuria, Nitraria, Tetragonia, Mesembryanthemum), that soda was formerly obtained. These sources have become of little importance since artificial soda began to be made from common salt, a process invented by Leblanc, and put in operation near Paris toward the end of the eighteenth century. By this process common salt is decomposed by sulphuric acid, and the resulting sodium sulphate is mixed with limestone and coal, and heated in a reverberatory furnace, the product (technically known as black ash) consisting essentially of soluble sodium carbonate and insoluble calcium sulphid, which are easily separated from each other by lixiviation. By the Leblanc process the soda used in the arts was almost exclusively produced until about thirty years ago, when the so-called ammonia or Solvay process began to become of importance. This process had been patented in England as early as 1838, and tried there and near Paris, but without success. The difficulties were first overcome by E. Solvay, who in 1861 established a manufactory of soda by this process (since known by his name) near Brussels. By the ammonia or Solvay process a concentrated solution of common salt is saturated with ammonia, and then decomposed by carbonic acid. By this means sodium chlorid is converted into sodium carbonate, and the ammonia is afterward recovered by the aid of lime or magnesia. This process has within the past few years become of great importance, and at the present time about half the soda consumed in the world is made by it. Whether it will eventually entirely supplant the Leblanc process cannot yet be stated. The chief advantage which it presents is that the amount of coal consumed by it is much smaller than that required by the older process, so that countries where fuel is not very cheap and abundant can now make their own soda, being no longer dependent on England, as they were in large degree before the Solvay process became successful. For the properties of pure soda, see sodium carbonate, under sodium. Also called mineral alkali.

2. Soda-water. [Colloq.]—Ball soda, crude soda.—Caustic soda. See caustic.—Nitrate of soda. See nitrate.—Salt of soda, sodium carbonate.—Soda cocktail. See cocktail.—Soda niter. Same as nitratin.—Soda powder. See powder.

soda-alum (sō′dạ̈-al″um), n. A crystalline mineral, a hydrated double sulphate of aluminium and sodium, found on the island of Melos, at Solfatara in Italy, and near Mendoza on the east of the Andes. Also called mendozite.

soda-ash (sō′dạ̈-ash), n. The trade-name of sodium carbonate. See soda.

soda-ball (sō′dạ̈-bâl), n. An intermediate product in the manufacture of sodium carbonate, formed by fusing together sodium sulphate, coal-dust, and limestone. Also called black ash. See also soda.

soda-biscuit (sō′dạ̈-bis″kit), n. A biscuit raised with soda. See biscuit, 2. [U. S.]

soda-cracker (sō′dạ̈-krak″ėr), n. A kind of cracker or biscuit, consisting of flour and water, with a little salt, bicarbonate of soda, and cream of tartar, made into a stiff dough, rolled thin, and cut into squares. [U. S.]

> The eccentric old telegraph editor . . . kept a colony of white mice in a squirrel-cage, feeding them upon soda-crackers and milk. The Century, XXXVIII. 875.

soda-feldspar (sō′dạ̈-feld″spär), n. See feldspar.

soda-fountain (sō′dạ̈-foun″tạ̄n), n. 1. A metal or marble structure containing water charged with carbonic-acid gas (or containing materials for its production), with faucets through which the water can be drawn off. Soda-fountains commonly contain tanks for flavoring-syrups and a reservoir for ice.—2. A strong metal vessel lined with glass or other non-corrosible material, used to store and transport water charged with carbonic-acid gas under pressure.

soda-furnace (sō′dạ̈-fėr″nās), n. A furnace for converting into the carbonate, by fusing with chalk and slaked lime or small coal, the sulphate of soda obtained by treating common salt with sulphuric acid. In a usual form the cylinder which receives the charge is heated red-hot before being filled, and is caused to rotate by appropriate mechanism. E. H. Knight.

sodaic (sō-dā′ik), a. [< soda + -ic.] Of, relating to, or containing soda: as, sodaic powders.

sodainet, a. An obsolete form of sudden.

soda-lime (sō′dạ̈-līm), n. In chem., a mixture of caustic soda and quicklime, used chiefly for nitrogen determinations in organic analysis.

sodalite (sō′dạ̈-līt), n. [< soda + -lite.] A mineral so called from the large portion of soda which enters into its composition. It is commonly found in volcanic rocks, occurring in isometric crystals and also massive, and is usually of a blue color, also grayish, greenish, yellowish, and white. It is a silicate of aluminium and sodium with sodium chlorid.

sodality (sō-dal′i-ti), n. [= F. sodalité, < L. sodalita(t-)s, companionship, friendship, a brotherhood or society, < sodalis, a mate, a fellow, a boon companion.] A fraternity; confraternity: especially in use by Roman Catholics for a religious fraternity or society.

> He was a learned gentleman, and one of the club at the Mermayd, in Fryday street, with Sr Walter Raleigh, &c., of that sodalitie, heroes and witts of that time. Aubrey, Lives (Thomas Hariot), note.

soda-lye (sō′dạ̈-lī), n. A solution of sodium hydrate in water.

soda-mesotype (sō′dạ̈-mes″ō-tīp), n. Same as natrolite.

soda-mint (sō′dạ̈-mint), n. A mixture containing sodium bicarbonate and spearmint.

soda-paper (sō′dạ̈-pā″pėr), n. A paper saturated with sodium carbonate: used as a test-paper, and also for inclosing powders which are to be ignited under the blowpipe, so that they may not be blown away.

soda-plant (sō′dạ̈-plant), n. A saltwort, Salsola Soda, one of the plants from whose ashes barilla was formerly obtained.

soda-salt (sō′dạ̈-sâlt), n. In chem., a salt having soda for its base.

soda-waste (sō′dạ̈-wāst), n. In the soda industry, that part of soda-ball or black ash which is insoluble in water. It contains sulphids and hydrates of calcium, coal, and other matters.

soda-water (sō′dạ̈-wâ″tėr), n. 1. A drink generally consisting of ordinary water into which carbonic acid has been forced under pressure. On exposure to the ordinary atmospheric pressure, the excess of carbonic acid escapes, thus causing effervescence. It rarely contains soda in any form; but the name originally applied when sodium carbonate was contained in it has been retained. It is generally sweetened and flavored with syrups.

2. A solution used to cool drills, punches, etc., used in metal-working.

sod-burning (sod′bėr″ning), n. In agri., the burning of the turf of old pasture-lands for the sake of the ashes as manure.

sod-cutter (sod′kut″ėr), n. A tool or machine for cutting or trimming sods; a paring-plow; a sodding-spade.

sodden[1] (sod′n), p. a. [< ME. sodden, soden, < AS. soden: see seethe.] 1. Boiled; seethed.

> And also brede, soddyn egges, and somtyme other vytayles. Sir R. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 17.
> Which drained by the blade-bones of sheepe, sodde and then burnt to powder. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 414.

2. Soaked and softened, as in water; soaked through and through; soggy; pulpy; pulpaceous; of bread, not well baked; doughy.

> It had ceased to rain, but the earth was sodden, and the pools and rivulets were full. Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, iv.

3. Having the appearance of having been subjected to long boiling; parboiled; bloated; soaked or saturated, as with drink.

> Double your files! as you were! faces about!
> Now, you with the sodden face, keep in there!
> Beau. and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, v. 2.

sodden[2] (sod′n), v. [< sodden[1], p. a.] I. intrans. 1. To be seethed or soaked; settle down as if by seething or boiling.

> It [avarice] takes as many shapes as Proteus, and may be called above all the vice of middle life, that soddens into the gangrene of old age, gaining strength by vanquishing all virtues. Mrs. S. C. Hall.

2. To become soft, as by rotting. [Unique.]

> They never fall who die
> In a great cause: the block may soak their gore;
> Their heads may sodden in the sun.
> Byron, Marino Faliero, ii. 2.

II. trans. To soak; fill the tissues of with water, as in the process of seething; saturate.

> Clothes . . . soddened with wet. Dickens, Little Dorrit, i. 11.

sodden[3]† (sod′n), a. [< sod[1] + -en[2].] Of sods; soddy. Court and Times of Charles I., II. 285. [Rare.]

soddenness (sod′n-nes), n. Sodden, soaked, or soggy character or quality.

> The soddenness of improperly boiled or fried foods will be avoided. Science, XV. 230.

sodding-mallet (sod′ing-mal″et), n. A beating-tool with a broad, flat face, for smoothing and compacting newly laid sods.

sodding-spade (sod′ing-spād), n. A spade with a flat, sharp blade, used for cutting sods; a sod-cutter.

soddy (sod′i), a. [< sod[1] + -y[1].] Consisting of sod; covered with sod; turfy.

soden[1]†, sode†. Middle English forms of sodden, past participle of seethe.

soden[2]†, sodein†, a. Obsolete forms of sudden.

sodenet, n. A Middle English form of subdean.

sodert, n. and v. A former spelling of solder. Isa. xli. 7.

sodeynt, sodeynliche†. Obsolete forms of suddenly, suddenly.

sodger[1] (sō′jėr), n. A dialectal form of soldier.

sodger[2] (soj′ėr), n. The whelk. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

sodic (sō′dik), a. [< sod(ium) + -ic.] Consisting of or containing sodium.

sodic-chalybeate (sō′dik-kạ̄-lib′ē-āt), a. Containing both iron and sodium: used of mineral waters.

sodium (sō′di-um), n. [= F. G. sodium = Sp. Pg. It. sodio, < NL. sodium, < soda + -ium.] Chemical symbol, Na (natrium); atomic weight, 23. The metallic base of the alkali soda. See soda and metal. It was first isolated by Davy, in 1807, by electrolysis, and is at present obtained on a large scale by igniting sodium carbonate with charcoal. Sodium is a silver-white metal with a high luster, but it oxidizes rapidly on exposure to moist air. Heated in the air, it burns rapidly with a bright-yellow flame, very characteristic of the metal; thrown into cold water, it oxidizes, but does not become hot enough to set the evolved hydrogen on fire, as potassium does; with hot water, ignition of the hydrogen takes place. Its specific gravity at 56° is 0.9735; at the ordinary temperature it has the consistency of wax; at 204° it melts, and forms a liquid resembling mercury in appearance. Next to silver, copper, and gold, it is, of the metals, the best conductor of heat and electricity; next to cæsium, rubidium, and potassium, it is the most electropositive of the metals. It is extensively used in the laboratory as a powerful reducing agent; it is closely analogous to potassium in its chemical relations. Two of its compounds are very widely diffused in nature, and of the highest importance from various points of view; these are common salt and sodium carbonate, or soda.—Sodium bicarbonate, a compound having the formula $NaHCO_3$. It is a white crystalline powder, with a weaker alkaline taste than the other carbonate described below, and less soluble in water. Also called soda saleratus.—Sodium borate. See borax.—Sodium carbonate, a compound having the formula Na_2CO_3, either anhydrous or containing water of crystallization. (The method of manufacture is described under soda.) Anhydrous sodium carbonate, or chemically pure soda, is a white powder having an alkaline taste and reaction, readily soluble in water with evolution of heat. It fuses at a dull-red heat to a clear liquid. It is used in enormous quantities in the arts for a great variety of purposes. When crystallized from aqueous solution it forms transparent crystals, called washing-crystals, which contain ten equivalents of water. These effloresce on exposure to air.—Sodium chlorid, common salt, NaCl. See salt[1], 1.—Sodium line, the bright-yellow line (strictly a double line) which incandescent sodium vapor gives when viewed by the spectroscope: it corresponds to the dark absorption-line D (D_1 and D_2) of the solar spectrum.—Sodium nitrate. See nitrate of soda, under nitrate.

sod-oil (sod′oil), n. Oil pressed from sheepskins by tanners, and used in manufacturing the lowest grades of brown soap.

Laun. Sola, sola! wo ha, ho! sola, sola!
Lor. Who calls?
Laun. Sola! did you see Master Lorenzo? . . . Tell him there's a post come from my master, with his horn full of good news.
Shak., M. of V., v. 1. 39.

sola[2] (sō′lä), n. [Also solah, also solar (simulating solar[1]); < Beng. solā, Hind. sholā, the plant here defined.] 1. A tall leguminous swamp-plant, Æschynomene aspera, found widely in the Old World tropics. Its robust stems are of a pith-like texture (sometimes called spongewood), and in India are worked up into many articles, especially hats and military helmets, which are very light and cool. See Æschynomene and hat-plant.

2. Same as sola topi.—Sola topi or topee, a pith helmet or sun-hat made in India from the pith of the sola. See pith-work. Also solar topi, solar hat, and simply sola.

solace (sol′ās), n. [< ME. solace, solas, < OF. solas, solaz, soulas, F. soulas = Pr. solatz = Cat. solas = Sp. Pg. solaz = It. sollazzo, < L. solatium, solacium, soothing, consolation, comfort, < solari, pp. solatus, soothe, console, comfort. Cf. consolate.] 1. Comfort in sorrow, sadness, or misfortune; alleviation of distress or of discomfort.

I beseech your majesty, give me leave to go;
Sorrow would solace, and mine age would ease.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., ii. 3. 21.

2. That which gives relief, comfort, or alleviation under any affliction or burden.

Two goldfinches, whose sprightly song
Had been their mutual solace long, Liv'd happy pris'ners there.
Cowper, The Faithful Bird.

3†. Sport; pleasure; delight; amusement; recreation; happiness.

I am so ful of joye and of solas.
Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 350.

And therein sate a Lady fresh and fayre, Making sweet solace to herselfe alone.
Spenser, F. Q., II. vi. 3.

4. In printing, the penalty prescribed by the early printers for a violation of office rules.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Consolation, etc. (see comfort), mitigation, relief, softening, soothing, cheer, diversion, amusement.

solace (sol′ās), v.; pret. and pp. solaced, ppr. solacing. [< ME. solacen, solacien, < OF. solacier, solacer, F. solacier = Sp. solazar = It. sollazzare, < ML. solatiare, solatiari, give solace, console, < L. solatium, solacium, solace: see solace, n.] I. trans. 1. To cheer in grief, trouble, or despondency; console under affliction or calamity; comfort.

Thy own sweet smile I see,
The same that oft in childhood solac'd me.
Cowper, My Mother's Picture.

Leolin . . . foamed away his heart at Averill's ear:
Whom Averill solaced as he might.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

2. To allay; assuage; soothe: as, to solace grief by sympathy.

We sate sad together,
Solacing our despondency with tears.
Shelley, The Cenci, iii. 1.

3. To amuse; delight; give pleasure to: sometimes used reflexively.

From that Cytee men gon be Watre, solacynge and disportynge hem.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 21.

Houses of retralte for the Gentlemen of Venice & Padua, whereln they solace themselves in sommer.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 152.

=Syn. 1 and 2. See solace, n.

II.† intrans. 1. To take comfort; be consoled or relieved in grief.

One poor and loving child,
But one thing to rejoice and solace in,
And cruel death hath cateh'd it from my sight!
Shak., R. and J., iv. 5. 47.

2. To take pleasure or delight; be amused; enjoy one's self.

These six assaulted the Castle, whom the Ladies seeing so lusty and couragious, they were contented to solace with them.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 255.

solacement (sol′ās-ment), n. [< solace + -ment.] The act of solacing or comforting; the state of being solaced.

Solacement of the poor, to which our archquack now more and more betook himself.
Carlyle, Cagliostro. (Latham.)

solacious† (sō-lā′shus), a. [< OF. solacieux = Sp. solazoso = Pg. solaçoso, < ML. solatiosus, full of solace, cheering, entertaining, < L. solatium, solacium, solace: see solace.] Affording pleasure or amusement; entertaining.

The aboundaunt pleasures of Sodome, whych were . . . pryde, plenty of feadyng, solacyouse pastymes, ydelnesse, and eruelti'e.
Bp. Bale, English Votaries, ii.

In the literal sense you meet with purposes merry and solacious enough.
Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, Prol. to Gargantua, p. 95.

solæus, n. See soleus.

solah, n. See sola[2], 1.

solaint, a. A Middle English form of sullen.

Collins, Works (ed. 1800), p. 99. (Jodrell.)

A white solan, far away by the shores of Mull, struck the water as he dived, and sent a jet of spray into the air.
W. Black, Princess of Thule, xxvii.

Solanaceæ (sol-ā-nā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bartling, 1830), < Solanum + -aceæ.] An order of gamopetalous plants, of the series Bicarpellatæ and cohort Polemoniales, characterized by regular flowers commonly with a plicate border, carpels with many ovules, and a straight, spiral, or coiled embryo in fleshy albumen. The sepals, petals, and stamens are each usually five, the ovary usually entire and two-celled, with an undivided style. In its plicate corolla the order resembles the Convolvulaceæ, which are, however, unlike it in their few-seeded carpels and usually twining habit. Its other nearest ally is the Scrophularineæ, to which the tribe Salpiglossideæ, by its didynamous stamens and somewhat irregular flowers, forms a direct transition. The order includes about 1,750 species, perhaps to be reduced to 1,500, classed in 72 genera of 5 tribes, for the types of which see Solanum, Atropa, Hyoscyamus, Cestrum[1], and Salpiglossis. They are erect or climbing herbs or shrubs, or sometimes trees, and either smooth or downy, but rarely with bristles. They bear alternate and entire toothed or dissected leaves, often in scattered unequal pairs, but never truly opposite. The typical inflorescence is a bracteless cyme, either terminal, opposite the leaves, or lateral, but not truly axillary, and sometimes converted into umbels or sessile cinsters or reduced to a single flower. They are usually rank-scented and possess strongly narcotic properties, either throughout or in special organs, in Mandragora in the root, in most others strongly developed in the leaves, as in belladonna, tobacco, henbane, stramonium, and nightshade. In some, as the henbane, this principle is actively developed for a limited time only; in others, parts from which it is absent furnish a valued food, as the potato, tomato, and egg-plant, or a condiment, as Cayenne pepper. The order furnishes also several tonics and numerous diuretic remedies, as species of Physalis, Nicandra, Cestrum, and Solanum. Plants of this order are widely dispersed through warm climates of both hemispheres, extending beyond the tropics in North and South America, especially in the west, but less frequent in Europe and Asia. They are absent in alpine and arctic regions and in Australia. About 17 genera and 55 species are natives of the United States, chiefly in the southwest, and largely of the genera Lycium, Solanum, and Physalis. For other important genera, see Lycopersicum, Capsicum, Datura, Nicotiana[1], Petunia, and Solandra.

solanaceous (sol-ā-nā′shius), a. [< NL. Solanaceæ + -ous.] Belonging to the Solanaceæ.

soland (sō′land), n. See solan.

solander[1] (sō-lan′dėr), n. Same as sellanders.

solander[2] (sō-lan′dėr), n. [< Solander (see quot. and Solandra).] A form of box designed to contain prints or drawings. See the quotation.

A Solander case is the invention of Dr. Solander, of memory dear to readers of "Cook's Voyages," who used one to contain and preserve specimens for natural history, drawings, and matters of the kind. It is really a box, generally shaped like a book, one side of which, turning on hinges, serves for a lid, while the front, or fore edge of the case, is furnished with hinges to be let down, so that the fronts as well as the tops of the contents can be got at.
N. and Q., 7th ser., VII. 135.

Solandra (sō-lan′drą), n. [NL. (Swartz, 1787), named after Daniel Solander (born 1736, died about 1781), a Swedish botanist and traveler.] A genus of solanaceous plants, of the tribe Atropeæ. It is characterized by solitary flowers with a long calyx-tube, an obliquely funnel-shaped corolla with broad imbricated lobes and indupliate sinuses, five stamens, and a two-celled ovary imperfectly four-celled by false partitions, forming in fruit a pulpy berry half-protruded from the torn membranous calyx. The 4 species are all American and tropical. They are lofty climbing coarse shrubby plants, with entire smooth fleshy and coriaceous shining leaves, clustered near the ends of the branches, and very large terminal white, yellowish, or greenish flowers on fleshy pedicels. S. grandiflora, S. longiflora, and other species are sometimes cultivated from the West Indies under the name trumpet-flower, forming handsome greenhouse evergreens, usually grown as climbers, or, in S. longiflora, as small shrubs.

Solaneæ (sō-lā′nē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. L. de Jussieu, 1789), < Solanum + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the order Solanaceæ. It is distinguished by flowers with the corolla somewhat equally plicate or divided into valvate or indupliate lobes, and having perfect stamens and a two-celled ovary which becomes an indehiscent berry in fruit, containing compressed seeds with a curved embryo and slender seed-leaves not broader than the radicle. It includes 31 genera, very largely natives of South America. For some of the most important, see Solanum (the type), Capsicum, Lycopersicum, and Physalis.

solaneous (sō-lā′nē-us), a. Belonging to the Solanaceæ, or especially to Solanum.

solan-goose (sō′lan-gös), n. [< solan + goose.] The gannet, Sula bassana. Also solan and soland-goose. See Sula, and cut under gannet.

solania (sō-lā′ni ą), n. [NL., < Solanum.] The active principle of Solanum Dulcamara. See solanine.

solanine (sol′ą-nin), n. [NL., < Solanum + -ine[2].] A complex body, either itself an alkaloid or containing an alkaloid, the active principle of bittersweet, Solanum Dulcamara. It is a narcotic poison.

solano (sō-lä′nō), n. [< Sp. solano, an easterly wind (cf. solanazo, a hot, violent easterly wind, solana, a sunny place), < L. solanus (sc. ventus), the east wind (usually called subsolanus), < sol, sun: see sol[1], solar[1].] The Spanish name of an easterly wind.

solanoid (sol′ą-noid), a. [< NL. Solanum + Gr. εἶδος, form.] Resembling a potato in texture: said of cancers.

Solanum (sō-lā′num), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < LL. solanum, the nightshade.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, type of the order Solanaceæ, the nightshade family, and tribe Solaneæ. It is characterized by flowers usually with a deeply five- or ten-lobed spreading calyx, an angled or five-lobed wheel-shaped corolla, very short filaments with long anthers which form a cone or cylinder, open by a vertical pore or a larger chink, and are almost destitute of any connective, and a generally two-celled ovary with its conspicuous placentæ projecting from the partition. It is one of the largest genera of plants (compare Senecio), and includes over 950 published species, of which perhaps 750 are distinct. Their distribution is similar to that of the order, and they constitute half or two thirds of its species. They are herbs, shrubs, or small trees, sometimes climbers, of polymorphous habit, either smooth, downy, or woolly, or even viscous. They bear alternate entire or divided leaves, sometimes in pairs, but never truly opposite. Their flowers are yellow, white, violet, or purplish, grouped in panicled or umbeled cymes which are usually scorpioid, sometimes apparently racemose, rarely reduced to a single flower. The species form two groups, the subgenera Pachystemonum and Leptostemonum (Dunal, 1813), the first unarmed and with broad anthers, the other with long anthers opening by minute pores, and commonly armed with straight spines on the branchlets, leaves, and calyx. South America is the central home of the genus, and of its most useful member, the potato, S. tuberosum, which occurs in numerous wild varieties, with or without small tubers on the rootstocks, from Lima to latitude 45° S. in Patagonia, and northward to New Mexico. (See potato, potato-rot, and cuts under rotate and tuber.) There are 15 native species in the United States, chiefly in the southwest, besides numerous prominent varieties and 5 introduced species. The seeds of many species are remarkably tenacious of life, and are therefore soon naturalized, especially the cosmopolitan weed S. nigrum, the common or black nightshade, the original type of the genus (for which see nightshade, and figure of leaf under repand; and compare ointment of poplar-buds, under ointment); from this the name nightshade is sometimes extended to several other European species. For S. Dulcamara, the bittersweet, the other common species of the northeastern United States, a climber introduced for ornament, see nightshade, felonwort, dulcamara, and dulcamarin. Two others in the United States are of importance as prickly weeds, S. Carolinense (for which see horse-nettle), a pest which has sometimes caused fields in Delaware to be abandoned, and S. rostratum (for which see sand-bur), of abundant growth on the plains beyond the Mississippi, and known as the chief food of the Colorado beetle or potato-bug before the introduction of the potato westward. The genus is one of strongly marked properties. A few species with comparatively inert foliage have been used as salads, as S. nodiflorum in the West Indies and S. sessiliflorum in Brazil; but the leaves of most, as of the common potato, bittersweet, and nightshade, are more or less powerfully narcotic. (See solanine.) The roots, leaves, seeds, and fruit-juices yield numerous remedies of the tropics; S. jubatum is strongly sudorific; S. pseudoquina is a source of quina in Brazil, a powerful bitter and febrifuge; others are purgative or diuretic, as S. paniculatum, the jurubeba of Brazil; S. stramonifolium is used as a poison in Cayenne. The berries are often edible, as in the well-known S. Melongena (S. esculentum) (for which see egg-plant, brinjal, and aubergine). Others with edible fruit are S. aviculare (see kangaroo-apple), S. Uporo, the cannibal-apple or borodina of the Fiji and other Pacific islands, with large red fruit used like the tomato, S. vescum, the gunyang of southeastern Australia, S. album and S. Æthiopicum, cultivated in China and southern Asia, S. Gilo in tropical America, S. muricatum, the pepino or melon-pear of Peru, and S. racemosum in the West Indies. S. Quitoense, the Quito orange, yields a fruit resembling a small orange in color, fragrance, and taste. S. Indicum (S. Anguivi) is known as Madagascar potato, and S. crispum of Chili as potato-tree. Some species bear an inedible fruit, as S. mammosum, the macaw-bush (which see), also called susumber and (together with S. torvum) turkey-berry. For S. Bahamense, see cankerberry, and for S. Sodomæum, see Sodom-apple. Other species yield dyes, as S. gnaphaloides in Peru and S. Vespertilio in the Canaries, used to paint the face; S. Guineense, used to dye silk violet; and S. indigoferum, in cultivation in Brazil for indigo. S. marginatum is used in Abyssinia to tan leather; and the fruit of S. saponaceum is used as soap in Peru. Several species have been long cultivated as ornaments for their abundant red or orange berries, as S. Pseudo-capsicum, the Jerusalem cherry or winter-cherry (see cherry[1]), and the Brazilian S. Capsicastrum, the dwarf winter-cherry or star-capsicum. Many others are now cultivated as ornamental plants, and are known by the generic name Solanum, as S. Karstenii, from Venezuela, with violet flowers; S. betaceum, a small pink-flowered fleshy South American tree with fine scarlet egg-like fruit; and S. lanceolatum, with narrow willow-like leaves, reputed the most showy blooming species. Others are cultivated for their conspicuous foliage, as S. crinitum and S. macranthum, with leaves 2½ feet long; S. robustum, clad in showy red down; and S. Warscewiczii, with handsome flowers and large leaves elegantly cut. The climber S. jasminoides, the jasmine-solanum, is a house-plant from Brazil, esteemed for its large and abundant clusters of fragrant white or bluish flowers.

Same as solar engine.—Solar camera, chronometer. See the nouns.—Solar constant, the number which expresses the quantity of radiant heat received from the sun by the outer layer of the earth's atmosphere in a unit of time. As shown by the researches of Langley, its value is probably somewhat over three (small) calories per minute for a square centimeter of surface normal to the sun's rays. See calory and sun.—Solar cooking-apparatus, an arrangement for cooking food by the heat of the sun's rays. It consists essentially of a cooking-vessel inclosed in a glass frame, upon which the solar rays are directed by reflectors.—Solar cycle. See cycle[1].—Solar day. See day[1], 3.—Solar deity, in myth., a deity of the sun, or personifying some of the attributes or characteristics of the sun, or of the sun's action. A familiar example is the Greek Apollo or Helios. Solar deities play an important part in the mythology of ancient Egypt, the chief of them being Ra, the supreme power for good. The Egyptian solar deities are commonly distinguished in art by bearing upon their heads the solar disk. See also cut under Apollo, and compare solarism.—Solar eclipse. See eclipse, 1.—Solar engine, an engine in which steam for motive power is generated by direct solar heat concentrated by lenses or by reflectors upon a steam-generator, Solariidæ (sō-lā-rī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Solarium + -idæ.] A family of pectinibranchiate gastropods, typified by the genus Solarium. The animal has the tentacles nearly united at the base; eyes on the upper part of the outer side of their base; the proboscis long, cylindrical, completely retractile; and the shell conical and generally declivous from the apex, with carinated margin of the last whorl, and a deep umbilical cavity, recalling a spiral staircase. The species inhabit tropical seas. They are rather large and generally handsome shells, some of which are common parlor ornaments. See cut under Solarium.

solariplex (sō-lar′i-pleks), n. The solar plexus (which see, under plexus). Coues, 1887.

solarism (sō′lär-izm), n. [< solar[1] + -ism.] Exclusive or excessive explanation of mythology by reference to the sun; over-addiction to the assumption of solar myths. Gladstone, in Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 634.

solarist (sō′lär-ist), n. [< solar[1] + -ist.] An adherent of the doctrine of solarism. Gladstone, in Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 876.

solarium (sō-lā′ri-um), n. [< L. solarium, a sun-dial, a part of a house exposed to the sun, < solaris, of the sun: see solar[1].] 1. A sun-dial, fixed or portable. See dial, poke-dial, ring-dial, sun-dial.—2. A place arranged to receive the sun's rays, usually a flat house-top, terrace, or open gallery, formerly used for pleasure only, but in modern times commonly as an adjunct of a hospital or sanatorium, in which case it is inclosed with glass; a room arranged with a view to giving patients sun-baths.—3. [cap.] [NL. (Lamarck, 1799).] The typical genus of Solariidæ, containing the staircase-shells, as the perspective shell, S. perspectivum. They have a much depressed but regularly conic shell, angular at the periphery, and with a wide spiral umbilicus which has suggested the idea of a spiral stairway.

Staircase-shell (Solarium perspectivum).

solarization (sō′lär-i-zā′shon), n. [= F. solarisation; as solarize + -ation.] 1. Exposure to the action of the rays of the sun.—2. In photog., the injurious effects produced on a negative by over-exposing it in the camera to the light of the sun, as blurring of outlines, obliteration of high lights, loss of relief, etc.; also, the effects on a print resulting from over-printing the sensitized paper or other medium.

solarize (sō′lär-īz), v.; pret. and pp. solarized, ppr. solarizing. [= F. solariser; as solar[1] + -ize.] I. intrans. In photog., to become injured by too long exposure to the action of light.

> It is a familiar fact that iodide of silver solarizes very easily—that is, the maximum effect of light is quickly reached, after which its action is reversed.
> Lea, Photography, p. 137.

II. trans. 1. To affect by sunlight; modify in some way by the action of solar rays.

> A spore born of a solarized bacillus is more susceptible to the reforming influence than its parent was.
> Science, VI. 475.

2. In photog., to affect injuriously by exposing too long to light.

solary (sō′la-ri), a. [< ML. solaris* (used only as a noun), pertaining to the ground or soil, < L. solum, the ground, soil: see soil[1].] Of or belonging to the ground. [Rare.]

From the like spirits in the earth the plants thereof perhaps acquire their verdure. And from such solary irradiations may those wondrous varieties arise which are observable in animals. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vi. 12.

solast, n. A Middle English form of solace.

Solaster (sō-las'tėr), n. [NL., < L. sol, the sun, + aster, a star.] The typical genus of Solasteridæ, having more than five rays. In S. endeca, a common North Atlantic species, there are usually eleven or ten slender, tapering, and smooth arms, and the whole surface is closely reticulated. The corresponding sun-star of the North Pacific is S. decemradiatus.

Sun-star (Solaster endeca).

Solasteridæ (sō-las-ter'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Solaster + -idæ.] A family of starfishes, typified by the genus Solaster. The limits of the family vary, and it is sometimes merged in or called Echinasteridæ. There are several genera, most of them with more than five rays, as in Solaster. In Cribella (or Cribrella) the rays are six. In Crossaster papposus, a common sun-star of both coasts of the North Atlantic, there are twelve short obtuse arms, extensively united by a membrane on the oral surface, and the upper side is roughened with clubbed processes and spines. Echinaster sentus is five-armed (see cut at Echinaster). The many-armed sun-stars of the genus Heliaster (in some forms of which the rays are more than thirty in number) are brought under this family or referred elsewhere. Also written Solastridæ.

solatium (sō-lā'shi-um), n.; pl. solatia (-ä). [L., also solacium, consolation, solace: see solace.] Anything that alleviates or compensates for suffering or loss; a compensation; specifically, in Scots law, a sum of money paid, over and above actual damages, to an injured party by the person who inflicted the injury, as a solace for wounded feelings.

sold[1] (sōld). Preterit and past participle of sell[1].

sold[2]†, n. [< ME. solde, souldye, soude, sowde, sowd = MHG. solt, G. sold = Sw. Dan. sold, < OF. solde, soulde, soude, F. solde, pay (of soldiers). = Sp. sueldo = Pg. It. soldo, pay, < ML. soldus, soldum, pay (of soldiers); cf. OF. sol, sou, a piece of money, a shilling, F. sou, a small coin or value, = Pr. sol = Sp. sueldo = Pg. Hence ult. soldier.] Pay (of soldiers, etc.); salary. Spenser, F. Q., II. ix. 6.

My Lord Tresorer graunted the seid vij. c. marc to my Lord of Northfolk, for the arrerag of hys sowde qeyl he was in Scotland. Paston Letters, I. 41.

sold[2]†, soud[2]†, v. t. [< ME. solden, souden*, < OF. solder, souder, pay, < solde, soude, pay: see sold[2], n.] To pay.

Imparfit is the pope that al the peuple sholde helpe,
And soudeth hem that sleeth suche as he sholde saue.
Piers Plowman (C), xxii. 431.

soldadot (sōl-dä'dō), n. [< Sp. soldado, a soldier: see soldier.] A soldier. Scott, Legend of Montrose, iii.

Come, help me; come, come, boys; soldadoes, comrades.
Fletcher, Rule a Wife, iv. 3.

soldant†, n. An obsolete form of sultan.

soldanel (sol'da-nel), n. A plant of the genus Soldanella. Also written soldanelle.

Soldanella (sol-da-nel'ä), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700) soldanella, dim. of soldana, a plant so called, < OIt. soldo, a coin: see soldo.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Primulaceæ, the primrose family, and tribe Primuleæ. It is characterized by flowers with a five-parted calyx, a broadly funnel-shaped or somewhat bell-shaped corolla with fringed lobes, five stamens inserted on the corolla, and an ovoid ovary which becomes a circumscissile capsule with a five- to ten-toothed mouth, containing many seeds on an elongated central placenta. There are 4 species, alpine plants of Europe. They are smooth, delicate, stemless herbs, growing from a short perennial rootstock, and bearing long-stalked, fleshy, and entire roundish leaves with a heart-shaped base. The nodding flowers, single or umbeled, are borne on a slender scape, and are blue, violet, rose-colored, or rarely white. S. alpina, growing near the snow-line on many European mountains, is, with other species, sometimes cultivated under the name soldanel or soldanelle, and has been also called blue moonwort.

soldanrie†, soldanry†, n. Obsolete forms of sultanry.

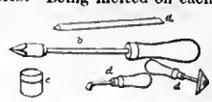
soldatesque (sol-da-tesk'), a. [< F. soldatesque, < soldat, a soldier (see soldier), + -esque.] Of or relating to a soldier; soldier-like. [A Gallicism.]

His [the Captain's] cane clanking on the pavement, or waving round him in the execution of military cuts and soldatesque manœuvres. Thackeray, Pendennis, xxii.

solder (sod'ėr or sol'dėr), n. [Early mod. E. also soulder, soder, sowder (dial. also sawder); < OF. souldure, soudure, soudeure, soudure, F. soudure = Sp. Pg. soldadura = It. soldatura, a soldering, < OF. souder, soulder, orig. solder*, solder, consolidate, close or fasten together, = Pr. soldar, soudar = Sp. Pg. soldar = It. soldare, sodare, < L. solidare, make firm, < solidus, solid, firm: see solid, and cf. soud[1].] 1. A fusible alloy used for joining or binding together metal surfaces or joints, as the edges of tin cans, jewelry, and kitchen utensils. Being melted on each surface, the solder, partly by chemical attraction and partly by cohesive force, binds them together. After cleaning the edges to be joined, the workman applies a solution of zinc in hydrochloric acid and also powdered rosin to the cleaned surfaces; then he touches the heated soldering-iron to the rosin, and holding the solder-bar and iron over the parts to be joined melts off little drops of solder at intervals along the margins, and runs all together with the hot iron. There are many of these alloys, as soft solder used for tinware, hard solder for brass and iron, gold solder, silver solder, spelter solder, plumbers' solder, etc. Every kind is used at its own melting-point, which must always be lower than that of the metals to be united, soft solders being the most fusible.



Tools and Materials used in Soldering.

a, bar of solder; b, soldering-iron; c, rosin-box; d, d, shavers or scrapers, used for cleaning surfaces and leveling down protuberances or lumps in the soft solder after it is applied.

To soder such gold, there is a proper glew or soder.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxxiii. 5.

Hence—2. Figuratively, that which unites in any way.

Friendship! mysterious cement of the soul,
Sweetener of life, and solder of society.
Blair, The Grave, l. 89.

Aluminium solder. See aluminium.—Hard solder, solder which fuses only at red heat, and therefore is used only to unite the metals and alloys which can endure that temperature. Spelter solder and silver solder are the principal varieties.—Soft solder. (a) See def. 1. (b) Gross flattery or fulsome praise, particularly when used for selfish aims.

solder (sod'ėr or sol'dėr), v. t. [Early mod. E. also soulder, soder, sowder; < solder, n.] 1. To unite by a metallic cement; join by a metallic substance in a state of fusion, which hardens in cooling, and renders the joint solid.

I sowder a metall with sowlder. Je soulde.
Palsgrave, p. 725.

2. Figuratively, to close up or unite firmly by any means.

As if the world should cleaue, and that slaine men Should soader vp the Rift.
Shak., A. and C. (folio 1623), iii. 4. 32.

Would my lips had been soldered when I spake on 't!
B. Jonson, Epicœne, ii. 2.

solderer (sod'ėr-ėr or sol'dėr-ėr), n. [< solder + -er[1].] One who or a machine which solders.

soldering (sod'ėr-ing or sol'dėr-ing), n. [Verbal n. of solder, v.] 1. The act of one who or that which solders.—2. A soldered place or part.

Even the delicate solderings of the ends of these wires to the copper clips were apparently the same as ever.
Elect. Rev. (Eng.), XXV. 349.

Autogenous soldering. See autogenous.—Galvanic soldering, the process of uniting two pieces of metal by means of another metal deposited between them through the agency of a voltaic current.—Soldering nipple. See nipple.

soldering-block (sod'ėr-ing-blok), n. A tool employed in soldering cans, as a support and for trimming. It is adjustable for different sizes.

soldering-bolt (sod'ėr-ing-bōlt), n. Same as soldering-iron.

soldering-frame (sod'ėr-ing-frām), n. A form of clamp for holding the parts together in soldering cans.

soldering-furnace (sod'ėr-ing-fėr″nās), n. A portable furnace used by tinners, etc., for heating soldering-irons.

soldering-iron (sod'ėr-ing-ī″ėrn), n. A tool with which solder is melted and applied. It consists of a copper bit or bolt, having a pointed or wedge-shaped end, fastened to an iron rod with a wooden handle. In some forms the copper bit is kept hot by means of a gas-flame supplied through a flexible pipe connected with the handle. See cut under solder.

soldering-machine (sod'ėr-ing-ma-shēn″), n. In sheet-metal work, a general name for appliances and machines for closing the seams of tin cans with solder; also, a soldering-block, or any other machine or appliance rendering mechanical aid in soldering. The cans may be automatically dipped in molten solder, or the solder may be laid on the seams, which are then exposed to a gas-flame, hot blast, or the direct heat of a furnace.

soldering-pot (sod'ėr-ing-pot), n. A small portable furnace used in soldering, especially for uniting the ends of telegraph-wires. It is fitted with a clamp for holding the ends of the wires, etc., in position; and when they are in place the furnace is tilted, and the melted solder flows over the wires, etc., and forms a soldered joint.

soldering-tongs (sod'ėr-ing-tôngz), n. sing. and pl. A flat-nosed tongs for brazing the joints of band-saws. The saw is held in a scarfing-frame, with a film of solder between the lapping scarfed edges. This film is melted by clamping the heated tongs over the edges. E. H. Knight.

soldering-tool (sod'ėr-ing-tōl), n. A soldering-iron, or other tool for soldering.

solder-machine (sod'ėr-ma-shēn″), n. A machine for forming molten solder into rods or drops for use.

soldi, n. Plural of soldo.

soldier (sōl'jėr), n. [Also dial. soger, sodger, sojer; early mod. E. souldier, soldiour, souldiour; < ME. souldier, souldyour, soudiour, sowdiour, sowdyowre, sodiour, soudeur, soudier, soudoier, < OF. soldier, also soldoier, souldoier, souldoyer, < ML. soldarius, a soldier, lit. Fie, my lord, fie! a soldier, and afeard?
Shak., Macbeth, v. 1. 40.

(b) One who serves in the land forces, as opposed to one serving at sea.

3. Hence, one who obeys the commands and contends in the cause of another.

Give me a favour, that the world may know
I am your soldier. Fletcher, Mad Lover, v. 4.

To continue Christ's faithful soldier and servant unto his life's end.
Book of Common Prayer, Public Baptism of Infants.

4. One of the rank and file, or sometimes including non-commissioned officers as opposed to commissioned officers.

Me thinkes it were meete that any one, before he come to be a captayne, should have bene a soldiour.
Spenser, State of Ireland.

That in the captain 'a but a choleric word
Which in the soldier is flat blasphemy.
Shak., M. for M., ii. 2. 131.

5. Emphatically, a brave warrior; a man of military experience, skill, or genius; a man of distinguished valor; one possessing the distinctive carriage, looks, habits, or traits of those who make a profession of military service: as, he is every inch a soldier.

So great a soldier taught us there
What long-enduring hearts could do
In that world's-earthquake, Waterloo!
Tennyson, Death of Wellington.

copper or billon, the twentieth part of the lira; a sol or sou.

sole[1] (sōl), n. [< ME. sole, soole (of the foot or of a shoe), < AS. sole (pl. solen, for solan*) = MD. sole, D. zool = MLG. sole, LG. sale = OHG. sola, MHG. sole, sol, G. sohle = Icel. sōli = Sw. *sål*a = Dan. saale = Goth. sulja, the sole of the foot, = OIt. suola, also suolo, It. suolo = Sp. suela = Pg. sola = Pr. sola, sol = F. sole, the sole of the foot, < ML. sola, a collateral form (found in glossaries) of L. solea, a slipper or sandal (consisting of a single sole fastened on by a strap across the instep), a kind of shoe for animals, also the sole of the foot (of animals), in ML. also the sole of a shoe, a flat under surface, the bottom, < solum, the ground, soil. Cf. soil[1], sole[2].] 1. The bottom or under side of the foot; technically, the planta, corresponding to the palm of the hand. The sole of ordinary language does not correspond well with planta, except in the cases of plantigrades. In digitigrades sole usually means only that part of the planta which rests upon the ground in ordinary locomotion, or the balls of the toes collectively; it also applies to the fore as well as the hind feet of such quadrupeds, thus including the corresponding parts of the palma, or palm; while the planta may extend far up the hind leg (only), as to the hock of the horse. In the horse sole is restricted to the under side of the hoof of either fore or hind feet (see def. 4 (b)). In birds the sole of the foot is the under side of the toes taken together. See planta, and cuts under plantigrade, digitigrade, scutelliplantar, and solidungulate.

The sole of their [the cherubim's] feet was like the sole of a calf's foot. Ezek. i. 7.

2. The foot. [Rare.]

Hast wandred through the world now long a day,
Yett ceassest not thy weary soles to lead.
Spenser, F. Q., I. x. 9.

3. That part of a shoe or boot which comes under the sole of the foot, and upon which the wearer treads. In boots and shoes with heels, the term is usually limited to the part that is in front of the heel and of nearly uniform thickness throughout. See half-sole, and cuts under boot[2] and poulaine.

You have dancing shoes
With nimble soles. Shak., R. and J., i. 4. 15.

4. The part of anything that forms the bottom, and on which it stands upon the ground; the bottom or lower part of anything. (a) In agri., the bottom part of a plow, to the fore part of which is attached the point or share. (b) In farriery, the horny under side of any foot; the bottom of the hoof. (c) In fort., the bottom of an embrasure or gun-port. See embrasure, 2. (d) Naut., a piece of timber attached to the lower part of a rudder, to render it level with the false keel. (e) The seat or bottom of a mine: applied to horizontal veins or lodes. (f) The floor of a bracket on which a plumber-block rests. (g) The plate which constitutes the foundation of a marine steam-engine, and which is bolted to the keelson. (h) The floor or hearth of the metal chamber in a reverberatory, puddling, or boiling furnace. (i) In carp., the lower surface of a plane. (j) The bottom frame of a wagon, coach, or railway-car. (k) The metal shoe of a sled-runner. (l) The lower edge of a turbine. (m) In ship-building, the bottom plank of the cradle, resting on the bilgeways, and sustaining the lower ends of the poppets, which are mortised into the sole and support the vessel. See cut under launching-ways. E. H. Knight. (n) In conch., the surface of the body on which a gastropod creeps.

5. A flat surface like the sole of the foot.

The stones in the boulder-clay have a characteristic form and surface. They are usually oblong, have one or more flat sides or soles, are smoothed or polished, and have their edges worn round. A. Geikie, Encyc. Brit., X. 367.

sole[1] (sōl), v. t.; pret. and pp. soled, ppr. soling. [< sole[1], n.] To furnish with a sole, as a shoe or boot; put a new sole on. Compare half-sole, v. t.

This fellow waits on him now in tennis court socks, or slippers soled with wool. B. Jonson, Epicœne, i. 1.

sole[2] (sōl), n. [< ME. sole = G. sohle = Sw. sola, < OF. compared to the form of a human sole; the dorsal and anal fins are very long, but free from the caudal, which has a rounded end, and pectorals are developed on both sides; the mouth is moderately decurved; the nostrils of the blind side are not dilated; and the height of the body is a little less than a third of the total length. The color is a dark brown, with a black spot at the end of the pectoral fin. This sole is common along the European coasts, and is one of the most esteemed of food-fishes. The flesh is white, firm, and of excellent flavor, especially when the fish has been taken in deep water. The average weight is about a pound, although the fish occasionally reaches a much larger size. It prefers sandy or gravelly shores, but retires into deep water when frost sets in. It feeds chiefly upon mollusks, but also on the eggs of fishes and other animals. It sometimes ascends into fresh water. There are other species, of several different genera, as Achirus lineatus, commonly called hog-choker. The name sole is also given to various species of the related family Pleuronectidæ. Along the Californian coast the common sole is a pleuronectoid, Lepidopsetta bilineata, which reaches a length of about 20 inches and a weight of five or six pounds, although its average weight as seen in the markets is about three pounds. In San Francisco only about two per cent. of the flatfishes caught belong to this species, but along Puget Sound it constitutes about thirty per cent. of the catch. It feeds chiefly on crustaceans and small fishes, and is regarded as an excellent food-fish. Other Pleuronectidæ called soles along the Pacific coast of North America are the Parophrys vetulus and Hippoglossoides jordani. See also cuts under Pleuronectidæ and Soleidæ.

It is remarkable as furnishing the world with the only really satisfactory lithographic stone, and as containing an extremely varied and well-preserved fauna, preëminent in which are the remains of the earliest known bird, the archæopteryx.

Solenidæ (sō-len′i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Fleming, 1828), < Solen + -idæ.] A family of bivalve mollusks, typified by the genus Solen; the razor-shells: so called on account of the resemblance of the shell in form to a razor. The animal is elongate; the siphons are short and united; the foot is rather large and more or less cylindrical; the long slender shell has nearly parallel dorsal and ventral contours, and is truncate or subtruncate in front as well as behind, while the hinge is nearly or quite terminal and has usually a single tooth in each valve; and the pallial line has a deep sinus. The species are widely distributed and numerous, belonging to several genera. See cut under Ensis. Also Solenacea.

solenite (sol′e-nīt), n. [< Gr. σωλήν, a channel, pipe (see solen), + -ite[2].] A fossil razor-shell, or some similar shell.

solenoconch (sō-lē′nō-kongk), n. [< NL. Solenoconchæ.] A tooth-shell or dentaliid, as a member of the Solenoconchæ.

Solenoconchæ (sō-lē-nō-kong′kē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σωλήν, a channel, pipe, + κόγχη, a shell: see conch.] An order or a class of mollusks; the tooth-shells: so called from the tubular shell. As an order, the Solenoconchæ are the only order of the class Scaphopoda; as a class, the name is synonymous with the latter. See Dentaliidæ. Also Prosopocephala, Solenoconcha.

Solenodon (sō-len′ō-don), n. [NL. (Brandt, 1833), < Gr. σωλήν, a channel, pipe, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] 1. The typical and only genus of the family Solenodontidæ, containing the opossum-shrews, S. paradoxus of Hayti and S. cubanus of Cuba, respectively called agouta and almiqui. They are insectivorous mammals, singularly resembling opossums, with a long cylindroid snout, long scaly tail, five toes on each foot, the fore feet with very long claws, the ears moderate and rounded, and the pelage long and harsh. See Solenodontidæ. Also Solenodonta.

2. [l. c.] A species of this genus; a solenodont. See almiqui, and cut under agouta.

solenodont (sō-len′ō-dont), a. and n. [< Solenodon(t-).] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Solenodontidæ, or having their characters.

II. n. A solenodon.

Solenodontidæ (sō-lē-nō-don′ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Solenodon(t-) + -idæ.] A family of mammals, of the order Insectivora, peculiar to the West Indies. It is related to the Madagascar Centetidæ, but has the pelage without spines, the penis abdominal, the testes perineal, the teats on the buttocks, the uterine horns ending in cæcal sacs, the intestine without a cæcum, the tibia and fibula distinct, the pubic symphysis short, the skull slender with an orbital constriction, small brain-case, large squamosal bones, annular tympanics, no postorbital processes or zygomatic arches, and the dental formula characteristic. There is but one genus, Solenodon. See cut under agouta.

Solenogastra (sō-lē-nō-gas′trä), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Solenogastres.

Solenogastres (sō-lē-nō-gas′trēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σωλήν, a channel, pipe, + γαστήρ, the belly.] A group proposed by Gegenbaur for the reception of the two genera Neomenia (with Proneomenia) and Chætoderma: now referred to the isopleurous Mollusca. See Isopleura, and cut under Neomenia.

solenoglyph (sō-lē′nō-glif), a. and n. [< Gr. σωλήν, a channel, pipe, + γλύφειν, carve, cut: see glyph.] I. a. Having apparently hollow or perforated maxillary teeth specialized and isolated from the rest; of or pertaining to the Solenoglypha, or having their characters. These teeth are the venom-fangs of such serpents as vipers and rattlesnakes. They are not actually perforated, but have an involute groove whose lips roll together and fuse, forming a tube through which the poison is spirted when the snake strikes. See cut under Crotalus.

II. n. A solenoglyphic serpent.

Solenoglypha, Solenoglyphia (sol-ē-nog′li-fä, sō-lē-nō-glif′i-ä), n. pl. [NL.: see solenoglyph.]

The viperine or crotaliform serpents, a group of the order Ophidia, having the maxillary teeth few, canaliculated, and fang-like. It includes some of the most venomous serpents, as the rattlesnakes or pit-vipers, and the true vipers or adders. Nearly all fall in the two families Crotalidæ and Viperidæ, though two others (Causidæ and Atractaspididæ) are recognized. See Proteroglypha, and cuts under adder, Crotalus, pit-viper, and rattlesnake.

solenoglyphic (sō-lē-nō-glif'ik), a. [< solenoglyph + -ic.] Same as solenoglyph.

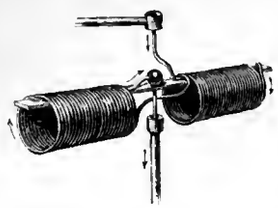
solenoid (sō'lē-noid), n. [< Gr. σωληνοειδής, pipe-shaped, grooved, < σωλήν, a channel, pipe, + εἶδος, form.] A helix of copper or other conducting wire wound in the form of a cylinder so as to be nearly equivalent to a number of equal and parallel circular circuits arranged upon a common axis. The ends of the wire are brought to the middle point, and when a current is passed through the circuit the solenoid behaves, as far as external action is concerned, like a long and thin bar magnet. For this reason, such a magnet is called a solenoidal magnet; and Ampère's theory of magnetism is based on the assumption that magnets and solenoidal systems of currents are fundamentally identical.



Solenoid.

A magnetic solenoid is an infinitely thin bar of any form longitudinally magnetized with an intensity varying inversely as the area of the normal section [that is, the cross-section perpendicular to the length] in different parts. J. E. H. Gordon, Elect. and Mag., I. 157.

solenoidal (sol-ē-noi'dal), a. [< solenoid + -al.] Pertaining or relating to a solenoid; resembling a solenoid, or equivalent to a solenoid magnetically.—Solenoidal magnet. See magnet.

solenoidally (sol-ē-noi'dal-i), adv. As a solenoid. Encyc. Brit., XV. 231.

Solenomya (sol-ē-nō'mi-ä), n. [NL., < Solen + Mya[1].] The typical genus of Solenomyidæ: so called because supposed to combine characters of the genera Solen and Mya. Menke, 1830. Also Solemya.

Solenomya togata (right valve).

Solenomyidæ (sō-lē-nō-mī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Solenomya + -idæ.] A family of bivalve mollusks, typified by the genus Solenomya. The mantle-lobes are mostly united, with a single siphonal orifice and one pedal opening; the foot is elongated, and there is a pair of narrow appendiculate branchiæ; the shell is equivalve, with a thin, spreading epidermis, toothless hinge, and internal ligament. These bivalves are sometimes called pod-gapers. Also Solenomyadæ (J. E. Gray, 1840) and Solemyidæ.

solenostome (sō-lē'nō-stōm), n. [< Solenostomus.] A solenostomoid.

Solenostomi (sol-ē-nos'tō-mī), n. pl. A suborder of lophobranchiate fishes with an anterior spinous dorsal and spinous ventral fins, including the family Solenostomidæ.

Solenostomidæ (sō-lē-nō-stom'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Solenostomus + -idæ.] A family of solenostomous lophobranchiate fishes, typified by the genus Solenostomus. An anterior high short spinous dorsal and a posterior low one are widely separated; the pectorals are inserted low on narrow bases, and the caudal is well developed. The few known species are peculiar to the Indo-Pacific ocean. The females carry their eggs under the belly, in a pouch formed by the ventral fins. Also Solenostomatidæ.

solenostomoid (sol-ē-nos'tō-moid), a. and n. [< Solenostomus + -oid.] I. a. Of, or having characters of, the Solenostomidæ; solenostomous.

II. n. A solenostome; any fish of the family Solenostomidæ.

solenostomous (sol-ē-nos'tō-mus), a. [< Gr. σωλήν, a channel, pipe, + στόμα, mouth.] In ichth., having a tubular or fistulous snout, as a pipefish of the genus Solenostomus; of or pertaining to the Solenostomi or Solenostomidæ.

Solenostomus (sol-ē-nos'tō-mus), n. [NL. (Lacépède, 1803), < Gr. σωλήν, a channel, pipe, + στόμα, mouth.] The typical genus of Solenostomidæ, including such species as S. cyanopterus. Also Solenostoma.

Solenostomus cyanopterus.

sole-piece (sōl'pēs), n. In mining, the lower part of a set or durnz. See the quotation under set[1], n., 13 (b).

sole-plate (sōl'plāt), n. 1. In mach., a bedplate: as, the sole-plate of an engine.—2. In a water-wheel, the back part of a bucket. It is often formed by a continuous cylinder concentric with the axis of the wheel, and having the buckets built upon it. E. H. Knight.

Also called lobe-plate.

solert†, n. A Middle English form of sollar.

sole-reflex (sōl'rē'fleks), n. See reflex.

soleret, n. See solleret.

solert† (sol'ėrt), a. [< L. sollers, less correctly solers (-ert-), skilful, clever, crafty, < sollus, all (see sole[3]), + ar(t-)s, art, craft: see art[2].] Crafty; subtle.

It was far more reasonable to think that, because man was the wisest (or most solert and active) of all animals, therefore he had hands given him.
Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 685.

solertiousness† (sō-lėr'shus-nes), n. [< solertious* (< L. sollertia, solertia, skill, cunning, < sollers, solers, skilful) + -ness.] The quality of being solert; subtleness; expertness; cleverness; skill.

The king confessed that they had hit upon the interpretation of his secret meaning: which abounded to the praise of Mr. Williams' solertiousness.
Bp. Hacket, Abp. Williams, i. 22. (Davies.)

soleship (sōl'ship), n. [< sole[3] + -ship.] Limitation to only one individual; sole or exclusive right; monopoly. [Rare.]

The soleship of election, which, by the ancient canons, was in the bishops, they would have asserted wholly to themselves. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 222.

sole-tile (sōl'tīl), n. A form of tile used for bottoms of sewers, muffles, etc., of which the whole circumference is not in one piece. It is made flat or curved, according to the needs of the case. See cuts under sewer[3]. E. H. Knight.

soleus (sō-lē'us), n.; pl. solei (-ī). [NL., also solæus (and solea), < L. solea, the sole of the foot: see sole[1].] A broad flat muscle of the calf of the leg, situated immediately in front of (deeper than) the gastrocnemius. It arises from the back upper part of the fibula and tibia, and its tendon unites with that of the gastrocnemius to form the tendo Achillis. The soleus is not a common muscle, and its great bulk in man, where it largely contributes to the swelling of the calf, is exceptional, and inversely proportionate to the smallness of the plantaris. See cuts under muscle[1] and tendon.

soleynt, a. and n. A Middle English form of sullen.

sol-fa (sōl'fä), v. [In ME. solfe, solfye, < OF. solfier, F. solfier = Sp. solfear = Pg. solfear, solfejar = It. solfeggiare, sing in gamut, sing by note, < sol + fa, names of notes of the gamut. Cf. solfeggio.] I. intrans. In music, to solmizate, or sing solfeggii.

I haue he prest and parsoun passynge thretti wynter, 3ete can I neither solfe ne synge ne seyntea lynes rede.
Piers Plowman (B), v. 423.

II. trans. In music, to sing to solmization-syllables instead of to words.

sol-fa (sōl'fä), n. and a. [See sol-fa, v.] I. n. In music: (a) The syllables used in solmization taken collectively; the act or process of solmization; solfeggio; also, rarely, same as scale or gamut.

As out of an alphabet or sol-fa.
Milton, Areopagitica, p. 40.

Now was our overabundant quaver and trilling done away, and in lieu thereof was instituted the sol-fa.
Swift, Mem. of P. P.

(b) See tonic sol-fa, under tonic. (c) The roll or baton used by the leaders of Italian choirs.

II. a. Of or pertaining to solmization in singing: as, the sol-fa method. or tonic sol-fa method.

sol-faing (sōl'fä-ing), n. [Verbal n. of sol-fa, v.] In music, same as solmization.

sol-faist (sōl'fä-ist), n. [< sol-fa + -ist.] In music, one who uses or advocates solmization.—Tonic sol-faist, one who uses the tonic sol-fa system (which see, under tonic).

The Tonic Sol-faists are now an integral part of the general musical life of the country.
Athenæum, No. 3193, p. 24.

solfamization (sōl'fä-mi-zā'shọn), n. [< sol + fa + mi + -ize + -ation.] Same as solmization.

solfanaria (sol-fạ-nā'ri-ạ), n. [It., < solfo, sulphur: see sulphur.] A sulphur-mine.

solfatara (sol-fä-tä'rä), n. [< It. solfatara, < solfo, sulphur: see sulphur.] An area of more or less corroded and disintegrated volcanic rock, over which sulphurous gases, steam, and other volcanic emanations escape through various orifices, frequently giving rise to what are known as mud-volcanoes, mud-cones, or salses; a region of dying or dormant volcanism.

solfataric (sol-fä-tä'rik), a. [< solfatara + -ic.] Of or pertaining to or resembling a solfatara.

Solfataric gases still issue, and are regarded as the result of the solfataric action upon chromic iron.
Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XXXIX. 73.

solfeggio (sol-fej'iō), n.; pl. solfeggii (-ii). [It., < sol + fa, names of notes of the gamut (see sol-fa), + -eggio, a common It. termination.] In music: (a) Same as solmization. (b) A vocal exercise consisting of tones variously combined in steps, skips, or running passages, sung either to simple vowels or to arbitrary syllables, and designed to develop the quality, flexibility, and power of the voice.

solferino (sol-fe-rē'nō), n. [So named from Solferino in Italy, because this color was discovered in the year (1859) of the French victory of Solferino. Cf. magenta.] The color of rosaniline; an intensely chromatic and luminous purplish rose-color. See purple.

soli, n. Italian plural of solo.

Solibranchia (sō-li-brang'ki-ạ), n. pl. [NL., < L. solus, sole, + branchiæ, gills.] Fishes: a synonym of Pisces. Latreille.

solicit (sō-lis'it), v. [< ME. soliciten, solycyten, < OF. soliciter, F. solliciter = Pr. sollicitar = Sp. Pg. solicitar = It. sollecitare, sollicitare, < L. sollicitare, less correctly solicitare, agitate, arouse, solicit, < sollicitus, less correctly solicitus, agitated, anxious, punctilious, lit. 'thoroughly moved,' < OL. sollus, whole, entire (see sole[3], solemn), + L. citus, aroused, pp. of ciere, shake, excite, cite: see cite[1]. Cf. solicitous.] I. trans. 1. To arouse or excite to action; summon; invite; tempt; allure; entice.

That fruit . . . solicited her longing eye.
Milton, P. L., ix. 743.

Sounds and some tangible qualities fail not to solicit their proper senses, and force an entrance to the mind.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. i. § 6.

2. In criminal law: (a) To incite (another) to commit a crime. (b) To entice (a man) in a public place: said of a prostitute. (c) To endeavor to bias or influence by the offer of a bribe.

The judge is solicited as a matter of course by the parties, and they do not approach empty-handed. Brougham.

3. To disturb; disquiet; make anxious. [A Latinism.]

Solicit not thy thoughts with matters hid.
Milton, P. L., viii. 167.

But anxious fears solicit my weak breast.
Dryden, Spanish Friar, iii. 3.

4. To seek to obtain; strive after, especially by pleading; ask (a thing) with some degree of earnestness or persisteney: as, to solicit an office or a favor; to solicit orders.

But, would you undertake another suit,
I had rather hear you to solicit that Than music from the spheres.
Shak., T. N., iii. 1. 120.

To solicit by tabour what might be rsvished by arms was esteemed unworthy of the German spirit.
Gibbon, Decline and Fall, lx.

The port . . . was crowded with those who hastened to solicit permission to share in the enterprise.
Bancroft, Hist. U. S., I. 40.

5. To petition or ask (a person) with some degree of earnestness or persisteney; make petition to.

Did I solicit thee
From darkness to promote me?
Milton, P. L., x. 744.

6†. To advocate; plead; enforce the claims of; act as solicitor or advocate for or with reference to.

Should
My brother henceforth study to forget
The vow that he hath made thee, I would ever Solicit thy desert. Ford, Lover's Melancholy, v. 1.

Who solicited the cause of the poor and the infirm, the lame and wounded, the vagrant and lunatic, with such a particular industry and zeal as had those great and blessed effects which we at this day see and feel.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. ii.

=Syn. 4 and 5. Request, Beg, etc. (see ask[1]), press, urge, pray, plead for or with, sue for.

II. intrans. To make solicitation.

There are greater numbers of persons who solicit for places . . . in our own country, than in any other.
Addison, Freeholder, No. 48.

When the same distress solicits the second time, we then feel with diminished sensibility.
Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 3. solicit† (sō-lis'it), n. [< solicit, v.] Solicitation; request. [Rare.]

Frame yourself
To orderly solicits.
Shak., Cymbeline, iii. 3. 52.

Within this hour he means his first solicit
And personal siege.
Shirley, Grateful Servant, i. 2.

solicitant (sō-lis'i-tant), a. and n. [< L. sollicitan(t-)s, solicitan(t-)s, ppr. of sollicitare, urge, incite: see solicit.] I. a. Solicitous; seeking; making petition: as, solicitant of a job. Encyc. Dict.

II. n. One who solicits. Imp. Dict.

solicitate† (sō-lis'i-tāt), v. t. [< L. sollicitatus, solicitatus, pp. of sollicitare, solicitare, solicit: see solicit.] To solicit.

[He] did urge and solicitate him, according to his manner of words, to recant.
Foxe, quoted in Maitland on Reformation, p. 494. (Davies.) solicitate† (sō-lis'i-tāt), a. [< L. sollicitatus, solicitatus, pp.: see solicit.] Solicitous.

Beinge no lease solicitate for them selues then meditatynge in what daunger theyr felowes had byn in Riuo Nigro.
Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, ed. [Arber, p. 121).

solicitation (sō-lis-i-tā'shon), n. [Formerly also sollicitation; < OF. solicitation, F. sollicitation = Sp. solicitacion = Pg. solicitação = It. sollecitazione, sollicitazione, < L. sollicitatio(n-), solicitatio(n-), vexation, instigation, < sollicitare, solicitare, pp. sollicitatus, urge, incite, solicit: see solicit.] The act of soliciting. (a) Excitation; invitation; temptation; allurement; enticement; disturbing effect.

Children are surrounded with new things, which, by a constant solicitation of their senses, draw the mind constantly to them. Locke.

The power of sustained attention grows with the ability to resist distractions and solicitations.
J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 99.

To use an old-fashioned expression of the first students of gravitation (an expression which has always seemed to me amusingly quaint), the solicitations of Jupiter's attractive force are as urgent on a swiftly rushing body as on one at rest. N. A. Rev., CXXXIX. 115.

(b) In criminal law: (1) The inciting of another to commit a crime. (2) The enticing of a man by a prostitute in a public place. (3) Endeavor to influence by bribery.

The practice of judicial solicitation has even prevailed in less despotic countries. Brougham.

He was generally poor, and often sent bold solicitations to everybody, . . . asking for places, for money, and even for clothes. Ticknor, Span. Lit., I. 353.

(d†) Advocacy.

So as ye may be sure to have of him effectual concurrence and advise in the furtherance and sollicitation of your charges, whether the pope's holiness amend, remain long sick, or (as God forbid) should fortune to die.
Bp. Burnet, Hist. Ref., I. ii. 2.

=Syn. (c) Entreaty, supplication, importunity, appeal, petition, suit.

soliciter (sō-lis'i-tėr), n. [< solicit + -er[1].] Same as solicitor.

I . . . thancke God that ye have occasyon govyn unto you to be a sollycyter and setter forth of such thyngs as do and shall conserve my said ende.
Cardinal Wolsey, To S. Gardiner (Ellis's Hist. Letters. [1st ser., cliii.).

solicitor (sō-lis'i-tor), n. [Early mod. E. solicitour, < OF. (and F.) solliciteur = Pr. sollicitador = Sp. Pg. solicitador = It. sollecitatore, sollicitatore, < LL. sollicitator, solicitator, a solicitor, first used in sense of 'a tempter, seducer,' ML. an advocate, etc., < L. sollicitare, solicitare, urge, incite, solicit: see solicit.] 1†. A tempter: an instigator.

Appetite is the Will's solicitor, and the Will is Appetite's controller. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, i. 7.

2. One who solicits: one who asks with earnestness.

We single you
As our best-moving fair solicitor.
Shak., L. L. L., ii. 1. 29.

3. An advocate; specifically, one who represents a party in a court of justice, particularly a court of equity. Generally, in the United States, wherever the distinction between courts of law and of equity remains, practitioners in the latter are termed solicitors. In England solicitors are officers of the supreme court, and the medium between barristers and the general public; they prepare causes for the barrister, and have a right of audience as advocates before magistrates at petty sessions, at quarter-sessions where there is no bar, in county courts, and in the bankruptcy court, but they cannot appear as advocates in any of the superior courts, or at assizes, or at any court of commission. Solicitors were at one time officers only of the court of chancery, but the term is now applied to all attorneys. In Scotland solicitors are of two classes—solicitors in the supreme court, who occupy a position similar to that of solicitors in England; and solicitors at law, who are members of a society of law-agents at Edinburgh, incorporated by royal charter and entitled to practise before inferior courts; they are also known by the name of procurators. Law-agents of both kinds in Scotland are now on an equal footing. Slater.

Be merry, Cassio,
For thy solicitor shall rather die
Than give thy cause away.
Shak., Othello, iii. 3. 27.

I take bishops to be the worst solicitors in the world.
Swift, Letter, Oct. 10, 1710.

City solicitor, in some of the United States, an officer having charge of the legal business of a municipality.—Crown solicitor. See crown.—Solicitor of the Treasury, an officer of the Treasury Department having charge of the prevention and punishment of all frauds, and the conduct of all suits involving the revenue of the United States, except those arising under the internal revenue laws of the United States, which are in charge of the Solicitor of Internal Revenue.

solicitor-general (sō-lis'i-tor-jen'ę-ral), n.; pl. solicitors-general. 1. In England, an officer of the crown, next in rank to the attorney-general, with whom he is in fact associated in the management of the legal business of the crown and public offices. On him generally devolves the maintenance of the rights of the crown in revenue cases, patent causes, etc.—2. In Scotland, one of the crown counsel, next in dignity and importance to the lord advocate, to whom he gives his aid in protecting the interests of the crown, in conducting prosecutions, etc.—3. In the United States: (a) The second officer of the Department of Justice, who assists the attorney-general, and in his absence performs his duties. (b) A chief law officer of some of the States, corresponding to the attorney-general in others. W. C. Anderson, Law Dict.

solicitorship (sō-lis'i-tor-ship), n. [< solicitor + -ship.] 1. The office or status of solicitor. —2. A mock respectful title of address applied with a possessive pronoun to a solicitor. Compare the analogous use of lordship. [Rare.]

Your good solicitorship, and rogue Welborn, Were brought into her presence.
Massinger, New Way to Pay Old Debts, ii. 3.

solicitous (sō-lis'i-tus), a. [= Sp. solicito = Pg. solicito = It. solleeito, sollicito, < L. sollicitus, less correctly solicitus, agitated, disturbed, anxious, careful: see solicit.] Anxious; concerned; apprehensive; eager, whether to obtain something desirable or to avoid something evil; very desirous; greatly concerned: disturbed; uneasy: as, a solicitous temper or temperament: generally followed by an infinitive, or by about, concerning, or for (less frequently of) before the object of anxiety or concern.

Ever suspicious, anxious, solicitous, they are childishly drooping without reason. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 164.

You are solicitous of the good-will of the meanest person, uneasy at his ill-will.
Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 216.

solicitously (sō-lis'i-tus-li), adv. In a solicitous manner; anxiously; with care or concern.

solicitousness (sō-lis'i-tus-nes), n. The state of being solicitous; solicitude.

solicitress (sō-lis'i-tres), n. [< solicitor + -ess.] A female solicitor or petitioner.

Beauty is a good solicitress of an equal suit, especially where youth is to be the judge thereof.
Fuller, Worthies, Northamptonshire.

solicitrix (sō-lis'i-triks), n. [< solicitor, with accom. L. fem. term. -trix.] Same as solicitress. Davies.

solicitude (sō-lis'i-tūd), n. [< OF. solicitude, sollicitude, F. sollicitude = Pr. sollicitut = Sp. solicitud = Pg. solicitude = It. sollecitudine, sollicitudine, < L. sollicitudo, solicitudo, anxiety, < sollicitus, solicitus, anxious, solicitous: see solicitous.] 1. The state of being solicitous; anxious care; carefulness; anxiety; concern; eager uneasiness of mind lest some desired thing may not be obtained or some apprehended evil may happen.

The terseness and brilliancy of his diction, though not at all artificial in appearance, could not have been attained without labor and solicitude.
Whipple, Ess. and Rev., I. 141.

2. A cause or occasion of anxiety or concern.

Mrs. Todgers looked a little worn by cares of gravy and other such solicitudes arising out of her establishment.
Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, xxxii.

=Syn. Concern, Anxiety, etc. See care.

solicitudinous (sō-lis-i-tū'di-nus), a. [< L. sollicitudo, solicitudo (-din-), solicitude, + -ous.] Full of solicitude. [Rare.]

Move circumspectly, not meticulously, and rather carefully solicitous than anxiously soliciudinous.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., I. 33.

solid (sol'id), a. and n. [Early mod. E. also sollid; < ME. solide, < OF. solide, vernacularly soude, F. solide = Sp. sólido = Pg. solido = It. solido, sodo, < L. solidus, also contracted soldus, firm, dense, compact, solid; akin to OL. sollus, whole, entire, Gr. ὅλος, whole, entire, Skt. sarva, all, whole: see sole[3]. Hence ult. sold[2], soldo, sol[2], sou, salder, soldier, consolidate, etc.] I. a. 1. Resisting flexure; not to be bent without force; capable of tangential stress: said of a kind of material substance. See II., I.

O, that this too, too solid flesh would melt,
Thaw, and resolve itself into a dew!
Shak., Hamlet, i. 2. 129.

2. Completely filled up; compact; without cavities, pores, or interstices; not hollow: as, a solid ball, as distinguished from a hollow one; solid soda-water, not frothy.

With the solid darkness black Closing round his vessel's track.
Shelley, Lines written among the Euganean Hills.

3. Firm; strong: as, a solid pier; a solid wall.

Doubtless a stanch and solid peece of framework as any January could freeze together.
Milton, Areopagitica, p. 40.

4. In bot., of a fleshy, uniform, undivided substance, as a bulb or root; not spongy or hollow within, as a stem.—5. In anat. and zoöl.: (a) Hard, compact, or firm in consistency; having no cavities or spongy structure: opposed to spongiose, porous, hollow, cancellate, excavated, etc. (b) In entom., specifically, formed of a single joint, or of several joints so closely applied that they appear to be one: especially said of the capitulum or club of capitate antennæ.—6. Having three dimensions; having length, breadth, and thickness; cubic: as, a solid foot contains 1,728 solid inches.—7. Sound; not weak; strong.

A solid and strong constitution of body, to bear the fatigue. Watts, Improvement of Mind. (Latham.)

A Bottle or two of good solid Edifying Port, at honest George's, made a Night chearful, and threw off Reserve.
Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, [I. 199.

8. Substantial, as opposed to frivolous, fallacious, or the like; worthy of credit, trust, or esteem; not empty or vain; real; true; just; valid; firm; strong; hence, satisfactory: as, solid arguments; solid comfort; solid sense.

In solid content together they liv'd.
Robin Hood and Maid Marian (Child's Ballads, V. 375).

Not barren praise alone, that gaudy flower,
Fair only to the sight, but solid power.
Dryden, Abs. and Achit., i. 298.

9. Not light, trifling, or superficial; grave; profound.

The older an Author is, commonly the more solid he is, and the greater teller of Truth. Howell, Letters, iv. 31.

These, wanting wit, affect gravity, and go by the name of solid men, and a solid man is, in plain English, a solid solemn fool. Dryden. (Johnson.)

This nobleman, being . . . of a very solid mind, could never be brought to understand the nature of my thoughts.
R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, lxviii.

10. Financially sound or safe; possessing plenty of capital; wealthy; well-established; reliable.

Solid men of Boston, banish long potations;
Solid men of Boston, make no long orations.
C. Morris. Pitt and Dundas's Return. From Lyra Urbanica. (Bartlett.)

11. Unanimous, or practically unanimous: as, a solid vote; the solid South. [Political slang, U. S.]—12. Without break or opening, as a wall or façade.

The apse, properly speaking, is a solid semidome, but always solid below, though generally broken by windows above. J. Fergusson, Hist. Arch., I. 475.

13. Smooth; even; unbroken; unvaried; unshaded: noting a color or pigment.—14. Without the liquor, as oysters: said in measuring: opposite to in liquor.—Pile solid, in her. See pile[2].—Solid angle. See angle[3].—Solid bath, a form of bath in which the body is enveloped in a solid or semisolid substance, as mud, hay, dung, peat, sand, or ashes.—Solid blow, cam, content, culture. See the nouns.—Solid bulb. See bulb, 1.—Solid color. (a) In decorative art, a color which invests the whole of an object, as a porcelain vase: more often used adjectively: as, solid-color porcelains; a collection of solid-color pieces. See def. 13. (b) With reference to fabrics, etc., a uniform color.—Solid geometry, green, harmonic. See the nouns.—Solid linkage. See linkage, 1.—Solid matter, in printing, matter set without leads between the lines.—Solid measure. Same as cubic measure (which see, under measure).—Solid number, an integer having three prime factors.—Solid problem, a problem which virtually involves a cubic equation, and can therefore not be solved geometrically by the rule and compass alone.—Solid South. See south.—Solid square (mdit.). See square[1].—To be solid for, to be thoroughly in favor of; be unflagging in support of. [Slang, U. S.]

"Lyra, don't speak of it." "Never!" said Mrs. Wilmington, with delight. "I'm solid for Mr. Peck every time." Howells, Annie Kilburn, xviii.

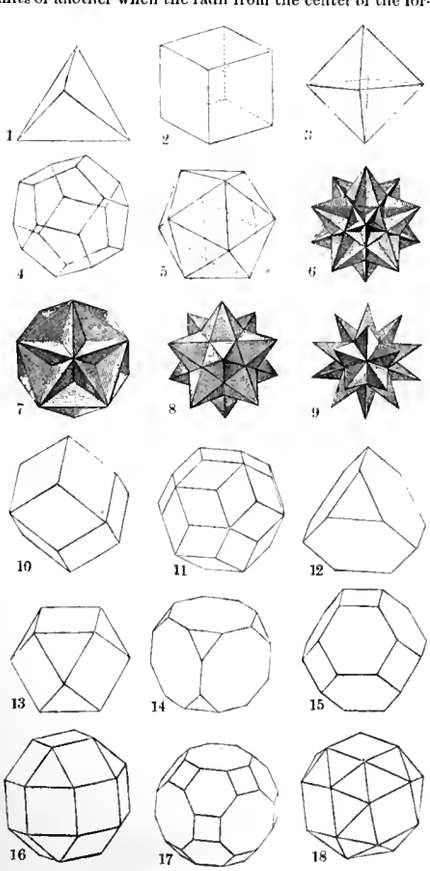
To be or make one's self solid with, to be or put one's self on a firm or satisfactory footing with; have or secure the unfailing favor or support of: as, to be solid with the police; to make one's self solid with those in authority or power. [Slang, U. S.]

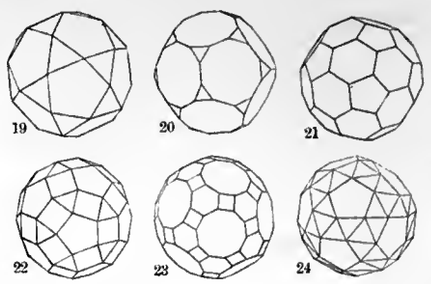
In nine cases out of ten, we thus succeeded in making ourselves "solid with the administration" before we had been in a town or village forty-eight hours.
The Century, XXXVII. 30.

=Syn. 1. Dense.—8. Stable, weighty, important.

II. n. 1. A body which throughout its mass (and not merely at its surface) resists for an indefinite time a sufficiently small force that tends to alter its equilibrium figure, always springing back into shape after the force is removed; a body possessing elasticity of figure. Every such body has limits of elasticity, and, if subjected to a strain exceeding these limits, it takes a set and does not return to its original shape on being let go. This property is called plasticity. The minimum energy required to give a set to a body of definite form and size measures its resilience. When the resilience of a body is small and masks its springiness, the body is called soft. Even fluids transmit shearing forces if time be allowed, and many substances will yield indefinitely to very small (but not indefinitely small) forces applied for great lengths of time. So solids that have received a small set will sometimes partially recover their figures after a long time. This property in fluids is called viscosity, in solids after-effect (German nachwirkung). The phenomenon is connected with a regrouping of the molecules, and indicates the essential difference between a solid and a liquid. In fluids diffusion is continually active, and in gases it produces phenomena of viscosity. In liquids it is not rapid enough to give rise to sensible viscosity, but the free motion of the molecules makes the body fluid, while the tendency of sets of molecules to continue for a while associated makes the fluidity imperfect. In solids, on the other hand (at least when not under strain), there is no diffusion, and the molecules are consequently in stationary motion or describing quasi-orbits. They thus become grouped in the mode in which they have least positional energy consistent with their kinetic energy. When this grouping is slightly disturbed, it tends to restore itself; but when the disturbance is greater, some of the molecules will tend to return to their old places and others to move on to new situations, and this may give rise to a new permanent grouping, and exhibit the phenomenon of plasticity. But if not quite sufficient for this, disturbances of the molecular motions somewhat similar to the secular perturbations of the planets will result, from which there will be no restoration for a very long time. Solid bodies are very strongly cohesive, showing that the molecules attract one another on the whole; and they are generally capable of crystallization, showing that the attractions of the molecules are different in different directions.

2. In geom., a body or magnitude which has three dimensions—length, breadth, and thickness—being thus distinguished from a surface, which has but two dimensions, and from a line, which has but one. The boundaries of solids are surfaces. Besides the three round bodies (the sphere, cone, and cylinder), together with the conoids, and the pyramids, prisms, and prismatoids, the most important geometrical solids are the five Platonic and the Kepler-Poinsot regular polyhedra, the two semi-regular solids, and the thirteen Archimedean solids. The faces, edges, or summits of one solid are said to correspond with the faces, edges, or summits of another when the radii from the center of the former to the mid-faces, mid-edges, or summits can be simultaneously brought into coincidence with the radii from the center to the mid-faces, mid-edges, or summits of the latter. If two solids correspond faces to summits, summits to faces, and edges to edges, they are said to be reciprocal. If to the edges of one solid correspond the faces or summits of another, while to the faces and summits together of the former correspond the summits or faces of another, the latter is said to be the summital or facial holohedron of the former. The regular tetrahedron is the reciprocal of itself, and its reciprocal holohedra are the cube and octahedron. The reciprocal holohedra of these, again, are the semi-regular dodecahedron and the cuboctahedron. The facial holohedron of these, again, is the small rhombicuboctahedron. The faces of the truncated cube and truncated octahedron correspond to those of the cuboctahedron. The snub-cube has faces corresponding to the cuboctahedron, and twenty-four faces which in two sets of twelve correspond to the summits of two other cuboctahedra. The faces of the great rhombicuboctahedron correspond to those of the small rhombicuboctahedron. Just as the cube and octahedron are reciprocal, so likewise are the Platonic dodecahedron and icosahedron, though they are related to no hemihedral body like the tetrahedron. Their reciprocal holohedra are the semi-regular triacontahedron and the icosidodecahedron, and the facial holohedron of these, again, is the small rhombicosidodecahedron. The faces of the truncated dodecahedron and truncated icosahedron correspond to those of the icosidodecahedron. The snub-dodecahedron has faces corresponding to those of the icosidodecahedron, and two sets of others corresponding to the summits of two other icosidodecahedra. The faces of the great rhombicosidodecahedron correspond to those of the small rhombicosidodecahedron. The faces, summits, and edges of the great icosahedron and great stellated dodecahedron correspond respectively to the faces, summits, and edges of the Platonic dodecahedron and icosahedron. The great dodecahedron and small stellated dodecahedron are self-reciprocal, both faces and summits corresponding to the faces of the Platonic dodecahedron or summits of the icosahedron. The faces of the truncated tetrahedron correspond to the faces of the octahedron or summits of the cube.





Geometrical Solids.

1, tetrahedron; 2, cube; 3, octahedron; 4, Platonic dodecahedron; 5, icosahedron; 6, great icosahedron; 7, great dodecahedron; 8, small stellated dodecahedron; 9, great stellated dodecahedron; 10, semi-regular dodecahedron; 11, semi-regular triacontahedron; 12, truncated tetrahedron; 13, cuboctahedron; 14, truncated cube; 15, truncated octahedron; 16, small rhombicuboctahedron; 17, great rhombicuboctahedron; 18, snub-cube; 19, icosidodecahedron; 20, truncated dodecahedron; 21, truncated icosahedron; 22, small rhombicosidodecahedron; 23, great rhombicosidodecahedron; 24, snub-dodecahedron. (12 to 24 are the Archimedean solids.)

3. pl. In anat., all parts of the body which are not fluid: as, the solids and fluids of the body. —4. pl. In printing, the parts of an engraving which show black or solid in print.—Archimedean, rectangular, right solid. See the adjectives.—Cissoidal solid, a solid generated by the rotation of the cissoid about its axis.—Kepler solid, or Kepler-Poinsot solid, a regular solid which inwraps its center more than once. There are four such solids—the great icosahedron, the great dodecahedron, the small stellated dodecahedron, and the great stellated dodecahedron. Three of them were mentioned by Kepler, and all were rediscovered by Poinsot. The names here used were given by Cayley.—Logistic solid, a solid generated by the revolution of a logarithmic curve about its asymptote.—Plastic solid, a solid substance whose limit of elasticity is far below its point of rupture, so that it can be shaped: thus, putty and wrought-iron are plastic solids.—Platonic solid, one of the old regular solids which inwrap the center only once. They are five—the tetrahedron, the cube, the octahedron, the twenty-vertexed dodecahedron, and the icosahedron.—Regular solid, a polyhedron whose faces are regular polygons, all alike.—Semi-regular solid, a body whose edges are all of equal length, whose faces are all alike and equally incline to one another at the edges, but whose faces are not regular polygons. Two such solids are known—the rhombic dodecahedron and triacontahedron.—Solid of least resistance. See resistance.—Solid of revolution. See revolution.

Solidago (sol-i-dā′gō), n. [NL. (Vaillant, 1720), ⟨ ML. solidago, goldenrod (Solidago Virgaurea), so called from its reputed vulnerary qualities, ⟨ L. solidus, solid: see solid.] 1. A genus of composite plants, the goldenrods, of the tribe Asteroideæ and subtribe Homoehromeæ, sometimes made the type of a further subdivision, Solidagineæ (De Candolle, 1836). It is characterized by several-flowered small and radiate yellow heads, with a small flat usually alveolate receptacle, and an oblong involucre of erect rigid bracts which are closely imbricated in several rows and are without herbaceous tips. The oblong or obovoid five- to twelve-ribbed achenes bear a copious whitish pappus of long and nearly equal slender bristles. From Aster, which it closely resembles in technical characters, it is distinguished by its taller wand-like habit, yellow rays, smaller heads, and the absence of cordate leaves; from Chrysopsis and Haplopappus by its narrow few-flowered heads; and from Bigelovia, its other most important near relative, by the presence of rays. The species have in general a very characteristic habit, being perennial herbs, usually with strictly erect unbranched stems, which bear numerous entire or serrate alternate sessile narrow stem-leaves and broader root-leaves, which taper into margined petioles. Numerous intermediate forms render many species difficult to distinguish. In the original species, S. Virgaurea, the golden-yellow flowers are massed in small clusters which form an elongated or interrupted spike, whence the popular name goldenrod. The typical inflorescence, however, is a terminal pyramidal panicle of determinate development, composed of numerous recurving and scorpioid one-sided racemes, best seen in S. Canadensis and S. rugosa. In other species the flowers form a dense thyrsus of straight and terete crowded racemes, as S. speciosa, of the Atlantic and Interior United States. A few others from the Ohio and Mississippi valleys, as S. rigida, produce nearly level-topped cymes. Four other cymose species were formerly separated as a genus, Euthamia (Nuttall, 1818), distinguished by lack of scorpioid branchlets and by their linear entire one- to five-nerved leaves, including the widely distributed species S. lanceolata and S. Caroliniana (S. tenuifolia), and connecting with S. pauciflosculosa, of the Southern States and the Bahamas, formerly separated as a genus, Chrysoma (Nuttall, 1840), because of its shrubby stem and few-flowered heads with one to three rays. Several other species are slightly aberrant: S. multiradiata, of the Rocky Mountains, sometimes has twelve rays, others usually five; S. discoidea, a racemose Gulf species, is wholly without rays and has a purplish pappus; this, with S. squarrosa of northern rocks and S. petiolaris of southern pine-barrens, varies also in the spreading tips of the involucral bracts. S. bicolor is remarkable for its cream-colored flowers. S. verna, of pine-woods near Wilmington, North Carolina, blooms in May; S. uliginosa, of northern peat-bogs, in July; S. juncea and S. elliptica in August; and S. rugosa, S. Canadensis, and most others mainly in September; S. nemoralis and S. cæsia continue well into October. The genus is one of the most characteristic of the United States, numerous both in species and in individuals, and not entirely wanting in any region. In the northern and central States it gives to the landscape much of its beauty, and is an important element of the prevailing yellow of autumn. There are nearly 100 species, of which 80, besides more than 30 important varieties, are natives of the United States, and the others are nearly all American, 9 of them occurring in Mexico, 2, 3, or 5 in South America (3 in southern Brazil, 2 in Uruguay, and 1 in Chili), and 1 in Hayti. Only 2 species are natives of the Old World, S. littoralis, limited to the Tuscan and Ligurian coast, and S. Virgaurea, which extends from Mount Parnassus north and west throughout Europe and into Siberia, Alaska, New York, and New England, in many widely differing varieties. Those of the United States are all, with 5 exceptions, confined to them and to British America (into which 32 extend), and are mainly natives of the Atlantic and central States. Numerous isolated species are southern: the northern are mostly of wider distribution and more abundant in individuals; 11 species are mainly confined to the high northern, 12 to the northeastern, 24 to the southern, 8 to the southwestern, 10 to the Pacific States; 6 belong to the Mississippi valley, of which S. Missouriensis is the only one widely distributed; 2 species, S. odora and S. sempervirens, extend throughout the Atlantic coast from Canada to Mexico, and the latter, the salt-marsh goldenrod, reappears at the Azores and at San Francisco. Forty-two species occur in the northeast quarter of the United States, 53 in the Southern States, and about 14 among the Rocky Mountains. S. Canadensis, the most numerous and most typical species, is also the one most widely diffused through the United States, followed next by S. nemoralis and S. rugosa. The species of this genus range from beyond 66° N. latitude to the city of Mexico, and from alpine summits to the sea-level; several are mostly confined to swamps, as S. potula, and a few to woodland borders, as S. cæsia and S. bicolor, but most are plants of dry open soil, especially S. nemoralis. In parts of the Atlantic coast the name goldenrod is locally confined to S. odora, the sweet goldenrod of authors, which contains in its dotted leaves an aromatic and stimulating volatile oil of an anisate odor and pale greenish-yellow color; it is also carminative and diaphoretic, and its infusion is used to relieve spasmodic pains and nausea; its dried flowers and leaves have been employed as a beverage, under the name of Blue-Mountain tea. S. Virgaurea, the goldenrod of Europe, contains an astringent and tonic principle, and was long in esteem for healing wounds.

A Goldenrod (Solidago nemoralis).

1. The upper part of the stem with the inflorescence. 2. The lower part of the stem, showing a stolon.

herbalists of two and three centuries ago pronouncing it "one of the most noble wound-herbs," and prescribing "a tea of the young leaves, green or dry." It was also once in repute in Europe as a dye, and a variety of S. nemoralis is locally called dyer's-weed in America. S. Canadensis and others have been popularly known as yellow-weed, and S. rugosa as bitterweed. S. rigida is also a reputed astringent. The goldenrod has been recommended by many as the national emblem of the United States.

2. [l. c.] A plant of this genus; goldenrod.

solidaret (sol-i-dār'), n. [Appar. < F. solidaire, solid (see solidary), with sense of ML. solidus, a piece of money: see solidus, soldo, sol[2].] A small piece of money.

Here's three solidares for thee; good boy, wink at me, and say thou sawest me not. Shak., T. of A., iii. 1. 46.

solidaric (sol-i-dar'ik), a. [Irreg. < solidar-y + -ic.] Characterized by solidarity. [Rare.]

In the very nature of things family supremacy will be absolutely incompatible with an interdependent solidaric commonwealth. The Century, XXXI. 745.

solidarité (sol-ē-dar-ē-tā'), n. [F.: see solidarity.] In French law: (a) The relation among co-debtors who are jointly and severally bound — that is, may be held jointly or severally at the option of the creditor. (b) The relation among co-creditors holding an obligation which gives expressly to each of them the right to demand payment of the entire debt, so that a payment made to any one will discharge the debt.

solidarity (sol-i-dar'i-ti), n. [< F. solidarité (= Sp. solidaridad = Pg. solidariedade), joint liability, mutual responsibility, < solidaire, solid: see solidary.] Mutual responsibility existing between two or more persons; communion of interests and responsibilities.

Solidarity, a word which we owe to the French communists, and which signifies a fellowship in gain and loss, in honour and dishonour. Trench, English Past and Present, p. 58.

Strong government came in with the sixteenth century, and strong government was a very strong element in reformation history, for it weakened the solidarity of the Catholic Church. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 232.

There is a solidarity in the arts; they do not flourish in isolated independence. C. E. Norton, Church-building in Middle Ages, p. 31.

solidary (sol'i-dā-ri), a. [= F. solidaire (= Sp. Pg. solidario), < solide, solid: see solid.] Characterized by solidarity, or community of interests and responsibilities; jointly interested or responsible.

Our one object is to save the revelation in the Bible from being made solidary, as our Comtist friends say, with miracles; from being attended to or held cheap just in proportion as miracles are attended to or are held cheap. M. Arnold, Literature and Dogma, viii.

solidate (sol'i-dāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. solidated, ppr. solidating. [< L. solidatus, pp. of solidare, make dense, make whole or sound, < solidus, compact, firm, solid: see solid.] To make solid or firm. [Rare.]

This shining Piece of Ice,
Which melts so soon away
With the Sun's Ray,
Thy verse does solidate and crystallize.
Cowley, Pindaric Odes, iv. 3.

solid-drawn (sol'id-drân), a. In metal-working, drawn from hollow ingots, in which mandrels of constantly decreasing diameter are successively inserted, till both exterior and interior diameters are brought down to the required dimensions.

solid-hoofed (sol'id-hōft), a. Solidungulate or soliped; whole-hoofed; not cloven-hoofed. See cut under solidungulate.

solid-horned (sol'id-hôrnd), a. Having solid deciduous horns or antlers, as deer; not hollow-horned. The solid-horned ruminants are the deer tribe. See Cervidæ and Tragulidæ.

solidi, n. Plural of solidus.

solidifiable (sō-lid'i-fī-a-bl), a. [< solidify + -able.] Capable of being solidified or rendered solid.

solidification (sō-lid'i-fi-kā'shon), n. [< solidify + -ation (see -fy).] The act or process of making solid; specifically, in physics, the passage of a body from a liquid or gaseous to a solid state. It is accompanied by evolution of heat without a decrease of temperature, and by change of volume.

solidify (sō-lid'i-fī), v.; pret. and pp. solidified, ppr. solidifying. [< F. solidifier = Sp. Pg. solidificar; as solid + -fy.] I. trans. To convert from a liquid or gaseous state to a solid state; make solid or compact: as, to solidify hydrogen.

II. intrans. To become solid or compact: as, water solidifies into ice through cold.

solidism (sol'i-dizm), n. [< solid + -ism.] In med., the doctrine that refers all diseases to alterations of the solid parts of the body. It rests on the opinion that the solids alone are endowed with vital properties, and that they only can receive the impression of morbific agents and be the seat of pathological phenomena. Opposed to Galenism or humorism.

solidist (sol'i-dist), n. [< solid + -ist.] One who believes in or maintains the doctrine of solidism.

solidistic (sol-i-dis'tik), a. [< solidist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the solidists.

It is perhaps natural that we should revert to the solidistic notion of the all-pervading influence of the nervous system. Lancet, 1889, II. 1123.

solidity (sō-lid'i-ti), n. [< F. solidité = Pr. soliditat = It. solidità, < L. solidita(t-)s, < solidus, solid: see solid.] 1. The state or property of being solid. Specifically—(a) The property of resisting a force tending to change the figure of a body: opposed to fluidity.

The idea of solidity we receive by our touch; and it arises from the resistance which we find in a body to the entrance of any other body into the place it possesses till it has left it. Locke, Human Understanding, II. iv. 1.

(b) The absolute impenetrability attributed by some metaphysicians to matter. [This use of the word is almost peculiar to Locke. Sir W. Hamilton attributes eight physical meanings to the word — the property of occupying space; extension in three dimensions; absolute impenetrability; great density; relative immovability; weight; hardness; and non-fluidity.] (c) Fullness of matter: opposed to hollowness. (d) Massiveness; substantiality; hence, strength; stability.

These towers are of tremendous girth and solidity; they are encircled with great bands, or hoops, of white stone, and are much enlarged at the base. H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 98.

(e) Strength and firmness in general; soundness; strength; validity; truth; certainty.

They answered the objections with great strength and solidity of argument. Addison, Tatler, No. 116.

The very laws which at first gave the government solidity. Goldsmith, Polite Learning, i.

2. In geom., the quantity of space occupied by a solid body. Also called its solid or cubic content or contents. The solidity of a body is estimated by the number of cubic inches, feet, yards, etc., which it contains.

3†. A solid body or mass. [Rare.]

Heaven's face doth glow;
Yea, this solidity and compound mass,
With tristful visage, as against the doom,
Is thought-sick at the act. Shak., Hamlet, iii. 4. 49.

Measure of solidity. See measure.

solidly (sol'id-li), adv. In a solid manner, in any sense of the word solid. (a) Firmly; densely; compactly: as, the parts of a pier solidly united. (b) Securely; truly; on firm grounds. (c) In a body; unanimously: as, the Democrats voted solidly against the bill. [Colloq.]

solidness (sol'id-nes), n. 1. The state or property of being solid; solidity.

The closeness and solidness of the wood. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 635.

2. Soundness; strength; truth; validity, as of arguments, reasons, principles, etc.

solidum (sol'i-dum), n. [L. solidum, a solid substance, neut. of solidus, firm, compact: see solid.] 1. In arch., the die of a pedestal. See cut under dado. — 2. In Scots law, a complete sum. — To be bound in solidum, to be bound for the whole debt, though only one of several obligants. When several debtors are bound each for a proportionate share only, they are said to be bound pro rata.

Solidungula (sol-i-dung'gū-lą), n. pl. [NL. (Blumenbach, about 1799), neut. pl. of solidungulus: see solidungulous.] The solid-hoofed, soliped, or solidungulate perissodactyl mammals, corresponding to the family Equidæ.

solidungular (sol-i-dung'gū-lăr), a. [< NL. solidungularis*, < L. solidus, solid, + ungula, hoof.] Same as solidungulate.

Solidungulate (right fore) Foot of Horse.

1, radius, its lower end with 2, a groove; 3, scaphoid; 4, lunar; 5, cuneiform; 6, pisiform; 7, magnum; 8, unciform (3 to 8 are in the carpus, and form the so-called "knee," which is the wrist, of a horse); 9, main (third) or middle metacarpal, or cannon-bone; 10, outer or fourth metacarpal, or splint-bone; 11, sesamoids or nut-bones in ligaments at back of metacarpophalangeal articulation, or fetlock-joint; 12, proximal phalanx, great pastern, or fetter-bone; 13, middle phalanx, small pastern, or coronary; 14, sesamoid in tendon of flexor perforans, called navicular by veterinarians; 15, hoof, incasing distal phalanx, or coffin-bone; 16, coronet.

Solidungulata (sol-i-dung-gū-lā'tą), n. pl. Same as Solidungula.

solidungulate (sol-i-dung'gū-lāt), a. and n. [< NL. solidungulatus, < L. solidus, solid, + ungulatus, hoofed: see ungulate.] I. a. Solid-hoofed or whole-hoofed, as the horse; of or pertaining to the Solidungula; equine. Also soliped, solipedal, solidungular, solidungulous. See cut in preceding column, and cuts under hoof and Perissodactyla.

II. n. A member of the Solidungula, as the horse or ass; an equino. Also soliped, solipede.

solidungulous (sol-i-dung'gū-lus), a. [< NL. solidungulus, < L. solidus, solid, + ungula, a hoof: see ungulate.] Same as solidungulate. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 2.

solidus (sol'i-dus), n.; pl. solidi (-dī). [LL., an imperial gold coin, ML. applied to various coins, also any piece of money, money (see def.), lit. 'solid' (sc. nummus, coin): see solid. Cf. soldo, sol[2], sou.] 1. A gold coin introduced by Constantine the Great to take the place of the aureus, previously the chief coin of the Roman currency. The coin weighed about 70 grains, and 72 solidi were struck to the pound. The solidus continued to be coined under the Byzantine empire, and at a later period received in western Europe the name of bezant. (See bezant.) In the middle ages the word solidus often indicates not any special coin, but a money of account, and was translated in the Teutonic languages by shilling and its cognates. Generally, the solidus or shilling of account contained 12 denarii, silver "pennies," the ordinary silver coins of the period. Abbreviated s., in the sequence £ s. d. (libræ, solidi, denarii), pounds, shillings, and pence.

Also I bequeith to the reparacion of the stepuil of the said churche of Saint Albane XX. solidos. Paston Letters, III. 463.

2. A sign (/) used to denote the English shilling, representing the old lengthened form of s., as in 2/6, for 2*s.* 6*d.* This sign is often a convenient substitute for the horizontal line in fractions, as in solifidian (sol-i-fid'i-an), a. and n. [Formerly also solifidean; < L. solus, alone, only, + fides, faith: see faith.] I. a. Holding the tenets of solifidians; pertaining to the solifidians.

$$1/2000,\ a\ b,\ (a\quad b)'c,\ \text{for}\ \frac{1}{2000},\ \frac{a}{b},\ \frac{a+b}{c}.$$

A solifidean Christian is a nullifidean Pagan, and confutes his tongue with his hand. Feltham, Resolves, ii. 47.

II. n. One who maintains that faith alone, without works, is all that is necessary to justification. See fiduciary, II., 2. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 325.

solifidianism (sol-i-fid'i-an-izm), n. [< solifidian + -ism.] The doctrine that justification is of faith only, without works.

It was ordered that . . . for a year no preacher should preach either for or against purgatory, honouring of saints, marriage of priests, pilgrimages, miracles, or solifidianism. R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., iv.

soliform (sol'i-fôrm), a. [< L. sol, the sun, + forma, form.] Formed like the sun. [Rare.]

For light, and sight and the seeing faculty, may both of them rightly be said to be soliform things, or of kin to the sun, but neither of them to be the sun itself. Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 204.

Solifugæ (sō-lif'ū-jē), n. pl. [NL. (Sundevall), fem. pl. of solifugus: see solifugous.] A suborder or superfamily of tracheate Arachnida, having the cephalothorax segmented, the cheliceres chelate, and the palpi pediform. They are nocturnal, hiding by day, active, pugnacious, and predatory, and are reputed to be venomous; they chiefly inhabit warm countries. There are 15 genera, of which Datames and Cleobis are found in the United States, and Galeodes is the most prominent. See Galeodidæ, and compare the alternative Solpugida (with cut).

solifuge (sol'i-fūj), n. [< NL. solifugus: see solifugous.] A nocturnal arachnidan of the group Solifugæ.

solifugous (sō-lif'ū-gus), a. [< NL. solifugus, shunning sunlight (cf. ML. solifuga, an animal that shuns the light), < L. sol, sun, + fugere, flee, fly.] Shunning sunlight; fleeing from the light of day; nocturnal, as a member of the Solifugæ.

soliloquacious (sō-lil-ō-kwā'shus), a. Soliloquizing; disposed to soliloquize. Moore, in Mason's Personal Traits of British Authors, II. 17.

soliloquize (sō-lil'ō-kwīz), v. i.; pret. and pp. soliloquized, ppr. soliloquizing. [< soliloqu-y + -ize.] To utter a soliloquy; talk to one's self. Also spelled soliloquise.

soliloquy (sō-lil'ō-kwi), n.; pl. soliloquies (-kwiz). [= F. soliloque = Sp. Pg. It. soliloquio, < LL. soliloquium, a talking to one's self, < solus, alone, + loqui, speak.] 1. A talking to one's self; a discourse or talk by a person who is alone, or which is not addressed to any one even when others are present.—2. A written composition containing such a talk or discourse, or what purports to be one.

Soliloquies; or, holy self-conferences of the devout soul, upon sundry choice occasions.
Bp. Hall, Soliloquies, Title.

The whole Poem is a Soliloquy. Prior, Solomon, Pref.

soliped (sol'i-ped), a. and n. [Also solipede; = F. solipède = Sp. solípedo = Pg. solipede, contr. < L. solidipes (-ped-), solid-hoofed, whole-hoofed, < solidus, solid, + pes (ped-) = E. foot.] Same as solidungulate.

solipedal (sol'i-ped-al), a. [< soliped + -al.] Same as solidungulate.

solipedous (sō-lip'e-dus), a. Same as solidungulate.

solipsism (sol'ip-sizm), n. [< L. solus, alone, + ipse, self, + -ism.] The belief or proposition that the person entertaining it alone exists, and that other people exist only as ideas in his mind. The identification of one's self with the Absolute is not generally intended, but the denial of there being really anybody else. The doctrine appears to be nothing more than a man of straw set up by metaphysicians in their reasonings.

solipsist (sol'ip-sist), n. [< L. solus, alone, + ipse, self, + -ist.] One who believes in his own existence only.

solipsistic (sol-ip-sis'tik), a. [< solipsist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to solipsism.

solisequious (sol-i-sē'kwi-us), a. [Cf. L. solsequium, the sunflower; < L. sol, the sun, + sequi, follow: see sequent.] Following the course of the sun: as, the sunflower is a solisequious plant.

solist (sō'list), n. Same as soloist.

solitaire (sol-i-tār'), n. [F., < L. solitarius, alone, lonely: see solitary.] 1. A person who lives in solitude; a recluse; a hermit; a solitary.

Often have I been quietly going to take possession of that tranquillity and indolence I had so long found in the country, when one evening of your conversation has spoiled me for a solitaire too!
Pope, To Lady M. W. Montagu, Aug. 18, 1716.

2. A precious stone, oftenest a diamond, set by itself, and not combined with other jewels.—3†. A loose necktie of black silk, resembling a ribbon, sometimes secured to the bag of the wig behind, and in front either falling loosely or secured by a brooch or similar jewel: a fashion for men in the eighteenth century.

He came in a solitaire, great sleeves, jessamine-powder, and a large bouquet of jonquils. Gray, Letters, I. 310.

4. A game which one person can play alone. In particular and properly—(a) A game played on a board indented with thirty-three or thirty-seven hemispherical hollows, with an equal number of balls. One ball is removed from the board, and the empty hollow thus left enables pieces to be captured. The object of the player is to take by jumping, as in checkers, all the pieces except one without moving diagonally or over more than one space at a time; or else, by similar moves, to leave certain configurations. (b) One of a great number of card-games, the usual object of which is to bring the shuffled and confused cards into regular order or sequence. This sort of game is more properly called patience.

5. In ornith.: (a) An extinct didine bird, Pezophaps solitarius. See Pezophaps. (b) A fly-catching thrush of Jamaica, Myiadestes armillatus, which leads a retired life in wooded mountainous resorts; hence, any bird of this genus. The name was originally applied to the bird of Martinique, now known as M. genibarbis. Townsend's solitaire is a common bird of many parts of the western United States. All are fine songsters. See Myiadestes. (c) The pensive thrush, Monticola or Petrocincla solitaria. See rock-thrush.

solitariant† (sol-i-tā'ri-an), n. [< L. solitarius, alone, lonely, + -an.] A hermit; a solitary.

solitariety (sol^{i}-i-tā-rī'e-ti), n. [< L. solitarius, alone, lonely, + -ety.] Solitary condition or state; aloneness.

According to the Egyptians, before all entities and principles there is one God, who is in order of nature before (him that is commonly called) the first God and King, immoveable, and alway remaining in the solitariety of his own unity. Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 336.

solitarily (sol'i-tā-ri-li), adv. In a solitary manner; without company; alone; by one's self; in solitude.

Feed thy people with thy rod, the flock of thine heritage, which dwell solitarily in the wood. Micah vii. 14.

solitariness (sol'i-tā-ri-nes), n. 1. The fact or state of being solitary, or alone, or without mate, partner, or companion, or of dwelling apart from others or by one's self; habitual retirement; solitude.

A man to eate alone is likewise great solitarinesse.
Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 97.

2. The state or character of being retired or unfrequented; solitude; seclusion: as, the solitariness of a wood.

Birds . . . had found their way into the chapel, and built their nests among its friezes and pendants—sure signs of solitariness and desertion.
Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 218.

solitariousness (sol-i-tā'ri-us-nes), n. Solitude; seclusion. Ascham, Toxophilus (ed. 1864), p. 41.

solitarityt (sol-i-tar'i-ti), n. [< solitary + -ity.] Solitude; loneliness.

I shall be abandoned at once to solitarity and penury.
W. Taylor, To Southey, Dec. 10, 1811.

solitary (sol'i-tā-ri), a. and n. [< ME. solitarie, solytarye, < OF. solitarie, solitaire*, F. solitaire = Pr. solitari, soletari = Sp. Pg. It. solitario, < L. solitarius, solitary (LL. as n. an anchorite), for solitatarius*, < solita(t-)s, loneliness, < solus, alone: see sole[3].] I. a. 1. Living alone, or by one's self or by itself; without companions or associates; habitually inclined to avoid company.

Those rare and solitary, these in flocks.
Milton, P. L., vii. 461.

The solitary man is as speechless as the lower animals.
Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., p. 286.

2. All by one's self; without companions; unattended.

The Indian holds his course, silent, solitary, but undaunted, through the boundless bosom of the wilderness.
Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 351.

3. Marked by solitude; especially, remote from society; unfrequented; retired; secluded; lonely: as, a solitary glen.

Whiche bothe lye in the abbey of saynt Justyne vyrgyn, a place of Blake Monkes, ryght delectable, and also solytarye.
Sir R. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 6.

Cor. And how like you this shepherd's life, Master Touchstone? . . .
Touch. . . . In respect that it is solitary, I like it very well. Shak., As you Like it, iii. 2. 16.

4. Free from the sounds of human life; still; dismal.

Let that night be solitary, let no joyful voice come therein. Job iii. 7.

5. Having a sense of loneliness; lonesome.

I am not solitary whilst I read and write, though nobody is with me. Emerson, Nature, i.

6†. Retiring; diffident.

Your honour doth say that you doe iudge me to be a man solitarie and vertuous.
Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 78.

7. Passed without company; shared by no companions; lonely.

I was upon Point of going abroad to steal a solitary Walk, when yours of the 12th current came to hand.
Howell, Letters, ii. 50.

Him fair Lavinia, thy surviving wife,
Shall breed in groves, to lead a solitary life.
Dryden, Æneid, vi. 1038.

8. Single; sole; only, or only one: as, a solitary instance; a solitary example.

A solitary shriek, the bubbling cry
Of some strong swimmer in his agony.
Byron, Don Juan, ii. 53.

Politeness was his [Charles II.'s] solitary good quality.
Macaulay, Dryden.

9. In bot., one only in a place; separate: as, a solitary stipule. A flower is said to be solitary when there is only one on each peduncle, or only one to each plant; a seed, when there is only one in a pericarp.

All the New Zealand species [Pterostylis trullifolia] bear solitary flowers, so that distinct plants cannot fail to be intercrossed. Darwin, Fertil. of Orchids by Insects, p. 89.

10. In anat., single; separate; not clustered; not agminate or gathered into patches; simple; not compound: as, the solitary follicles of the intestine.—11. In zoöl.: (a) Not social, sociable, or gregarious: noting species living habitually alone, or in pairs only. (b) Simple; not compound, aggregate, or colonial: as, solitary ascidians. See Simplices.—Solitary ants, the Mutillidæ or spider-ants.—Solitary bees, bees that do not live in a hive or community like the honey-bee, and are represented only by developed males and females, like most insects. There are very many species, of numerous genera. The designation is chiefly descriptive, not classificatory, but sometimes denotes the Andrenidæ as distinguished from the Apidæ.—Solitary bundle. Same as solitary funiculus.—Solitary confinement, in a general sense, the separate confinement of a prisoner, with only occasional access of any other person, and that only at the discretion of the jailer; in a stricter sense, the complete isolation of a prisoner from all human society, and his confinement in a cell so arranged that he has no direct intercourse with, or sight of, any human being, and no employment or instruction. Müller, J., In re Medley, 134 U. S., 160.—Solitary follicle. See solitary gland, under gland.—Solitary funiculus, a round bundle of fibers laterad of the combined small-celled nucleus of the glossopharyngeus, vagus, and spinal accessory, which passes out as one of the roots of the glossopharyngeus, but may contribute to the vagus and accessory. Also called ascending root of glossopharyngeus, fasciculus rotundus, ascending root of the lateral mixed system, fasciculus solitarius, respiratory bundle, and fascicle of Krause.—Solitary glands. See gland.—Solitary greenlet or vireo, Vireo solitarius, the blue-headed greenlet or vireo of the United States, having greenish upper parts, a bluish live in society, as the true wasps of the families Eumenidæ and Masaridæ, as well as all the digger-wasps: contrasted with social wasps. See digger-wasp, sand-wasp, and wasp.

II. n.; pl. solitaries (-riz). One who lives alone or in solitude; an anchorite; a recluse; a hermit.

The world itself has some attractions in it to a solitary of six years' standing. Gray, Letters, i. 154.

Downward from his mountain gorge
Stept the long-hair'd, long-bearded solitary.
Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

solito (sol'i-tō), adv. [It., < L. solitus, accustomed, < solere, be accustomed.] In music, in the usual, customary manner.

solitude (sol'i-tūd), n. [< ME. solitude, < OF. (and F.) solitude = It. solitudine, < L. solitudo, loneliness, < solus, alone: see sole[3].] 1. The state of being alone; a lonely life; loneliness.

Little do men perceive what solitude is, and how far it extendeth; for a crowd is not company. . . . It is a mere and miserable solitude to want true friends.
Bacon, Friendship.

O, might I here
In solitude live savage, in some glade Obscured! Milton, P. L., ix. 1085.

2. Remoteness from society; lack or utter want of companionship: applied to place: as, the solitude of a wood or a valley.

The solitude of his little parish is become matter of great comfort to him. Law.

3. A lonely, secluded, or unfrequented place; a desert.

We walked about 2 miles from ye citty to an agreeable solitude called Du Plessis, a house belonging to ye King.
Evelyn, Diary, June 7, 1644.

There is such an agreeable variety of fields, wood, water, and cascades that it is one of the most delightful solitudes I ever saw.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 224.

=Syn. 1. Solitude, Retirement, Seclusion, Loneliness, Lonesomeness. Solitude is the condition of being absolutely alone, whether or not one has been with others, or desires to escape from them: as, the solitude of the Sphinx. Retirement is comparative solitude, produced by retiring, voluntarily or otherwise, from contact which one has had with others. Seclusion is stronger than retirement, implying the shutting out of others from access: after the Restoration Milton for safety's sake kept himself in retirement; indeed, except to a few trusted friends, he was in complete seclusion. Loneliness expresses the uncomfortable feelings, the longing for society, of one who is alone. Lonesomeness may be a lighter kind of loneliness, especially a feeling less spiritual than physical, growing out of the animal instinct for society and the desire of protection, the consciousness of being alone: as, the lonesomeness of a walk through a cemetery at night. Lonesomeness, more often than loneliness, may express the impression made upon the observer.

solivagant (sō-liv'a-gant), a. [< L. solus, alone, + vagan(t-)s, ppr. of vagari, wander, roam: see vagrant.] Same as solivagous. [Rare.]

solivagous (sō-liv'a-gus), a. [< L. solivagus, wandering alone, < solus, alone, + vagus, wandering: see vague.] Wandering alone. Bailey, 1727. [Rare.]

solive (so-lēv'), n. [< OF. solive, solieve, F. solive (ML. reflex soliva, suliva, solivia), a girder, joist; origin uncertain; perhaps ult. < L. sublevare, lift up from beneath, support: see sollevate, sullevate, sublevate.] A joist, rafter, or secondary beam of wood, either split or sawed, used in laying ceilings or floors, and for resting upon the main beams.

sollar, soller (sol'ăr, -ėr), n. [Also solar; < ME. soller, sollar, soler, solere, < OF. soler, solair, solier, a floor, loft, granary, cellar, F. dial. solier, a granary, = Pr. solar, solier = It. solare, solajo = AS. solere, solor = OS. soleri = MD. solder, D. zolder = MLG. solder, soller = OHG. soleri, solāri, the pretorium, a guest-chamber, MHG. solre, solære, G. söller, a baleony, an upper room, garret, < L. solarium, a sunny place, a terrace, the flat roof of a house exposed to the sun, a sun-dial, < sol, the sun: see sol[1], solarium. Perhaps in some senses confused with L. solum, ground: see soil[1].] 1†. Originally, an open gallery or balcony at the top of a house, exposed to the sun; later, any upper room, loft, or garret.

Thou shalt make soleris and placia of thre chaumbris in the schip. Wyclif, Gen. vi. 16.

2. An elevated chamber in a church from which to watch the lamps burning before the altars. Encyc. Brit., II. 473. —3†. A story of a house. See the quotation.

Maison à trois estages. An house of three sollers, floores, stories, or lofts one over another. Nomenclator. (Nares.)

4. In mining, a platform or resting-place. See ladder-sollar and air-sollar.

solleret (sol'ėr-et), n. [Also soleret; < F. soleret, dim. of OF. soler, a slipper, < sole, sole: see sole[1].] The steel shoe forming a part of armor in the fourteenth century and later, usually having splints overlapping one another and a long point or toe curved downward. It was worn only when the foot was in the stirrup, and could be removed when the rider dismounted. See also cuts under armor and poulaine. —Bear-paw solleret, the steel foot-covering worn during the second half of the fifteenth century, resembling remotely the broad foot of the bear. Compare sabbaton.

Solleret (a) and Jambe (b), 14th century.

sollevate†, v. t. See sublevate.

sollicit†, sollicitation†, etc. See solicit, etc.

sol-lunar (sol'lū'nār), a. [< L. sol, the sun, + luna, the moon: see lunar.] Proceeding from or due to the influence of both the sun and the moon: in old medicine applied to the influence supposed to be produced on various diseases when the sun and moon are in conjunction.

solmizate (sol'mi-zāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. solmizated, ppr. solmizating. [< F. solmiser (as sol + mi, notes of the gamut (cf. sol-fa), + -iser = E. -ize), + -ate[2].] In music, to use solmization syllables. Also spelled solmisate.

solmization (sol-mi-zā'shon), n. [< F. solmisation; as solmizate + -ion. Cf. ML. solmifacio(n-).] In music, the act, process, or system of using certain syllables to name or represent the tones of the scale, or of a particular series, as the scale of C. The oldest and most important system of solmization is that attributed to Guido d'Arezzo, early in the eleventh century; though this in turn appears to have been suggested by a similar usage among the ancient Greeks. (See gamut.) The series ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la (derived from the initial syllables of the lines of a hymn to St. John, beginning "Ut queant laxis") was applied to the tones of each of the hexachords then recognized. (See hexachord.) When a melody exceeded the limits of a single hexachord, a change from one series of syllables to another was made, which was called a mutation or modulation. Early in the sixteenth century, when the modern octave scale became established, the syllable si (probably taken from the initials of the last line of the above hymn) was added for the seventh or leading tone. Somewhat later do was substituted in Italy and Germany for ut, on account of its greater sonority. The series thus formed is still in use, though other systems have been proposed. Such other systems are bocedization (bo, ce, di, ga, lo, ma, ni), also called bobization; bebization (la, be, ce, de, me, fe, ge); and damenization (da, me, ni, po, tu, la, be). In England and America, from before the middle of the seventeenth century to the beginning of the nineteenth, an abbreviated system was used, including only mi, fa, sol, la. The ideal application of solmization involves calling whatever tone is taken as the key-note do, irrespective of its pitch, and adjusting the other syllables accordingly, so that the scale-tones shall always be named by the same syllables respectively, and the various intervals by the same combination of syllables. This system is often called that of the movable do, since the pitch of do is variable. What is called the fixed-do system has also had considerable currency in Italy, France, and England, according to which the tone C is always called do, D re, E mi, etc., and this too when the pitch of these tones is chromatically altered, the system therefore following the arbitrary features of the keyboard and the staff-notation. This system is regarded by many musicians as contrary to the historic and logical idea of solmization, and its use in England and America is decreasing. The most important special application of solmization in musical study is that of the tonic sol-fa system (which see, under tonic), the syllables of which are doh, ray, me, fah, soh, lah, te. In the movable-do system the sharp of any tone is indicated by a syllable beginning with the same consonant as that of the tone, and using the vowel i: as, di for do♯, fi for fa♯, etc.; and similarly the flat of any tone is indicated by a syllable using the vowel e: as, me for mi♭, le for la♭, etc. The minor scale is solmizated in two ways: either beginning with la, and using the same syllables as in the major scale; or beginning with do, and using such modified syllables as may be needed (do, re, me, etc.). The great utility of solmization lies in its offering an abstract vocal notation of musical facts, whereby they may be named, remembered, and studied. Also solmisation, solfamization, solfeggio, and sol-faing.

solo (sō'lō), a. and n. [< It. solo, alone, < L. solus, sole: see sole[3].] I. a. In music, alone; not combined with other voices or instruments of equal importance; not concerted. A solo passage may be accompanied, however, by voices or instruments of less importance. —Solo organ, in organ-building, a partial organ introduced into large instruments, containing stops of special power or effectiveness, such as are used in producing striking solo effects. Its keyboard is usually the upper one when there are four, or the lower when there are three. Its stops are often connected with a special bellows, which is weighted with extra weights; they are then said to be "on a heavy wind." The choir-organ is also sometimes loosely called the solo organ. See organ[1]. —Solo pitch, in music, a special pitch or accordatura (scordatura) adopted by a solo performer upon a violin or other solo instrument, so as to produce peculiar and startling effects. —Solo stop, in organ-building, a stop either of special quality or placed on a heavy wind, so as to be fitted for the performance of solos. Such stops often occur in each of the usual partial organs, but in large instruments the most important of them are gathered into a separate partial organ called the solo organ (see above).

II. n.; It. pl. soli (-li), E. pl. solos (-lōz). 1. A melody, movement, or work intended for or performed by a single performer, vocal or instrumental, with or without accompaniment. Opposed to concerted piece, whether chorus, duet, trio, or for a number of instruments. —2. A game of cards, played usually by four persons, with a euchre pack. That player who bids highest—that is, offers to take the greatest number of tricks alone, or, in a variety of the game, aided by a partner—plays against the rest. If he takes five or more tricks, he receives a payment from them; if not, he makes a payment to them.

solograph (sol'ō-grâf), n. [< L. sol, the sun, + Gr. γράφειν, write.] A picture on paper taken by the talbotype or calotype process. Simmonds.

soloist (sō'lō-ist), n. [< solo + -ist.] In music, a performer of solos, vocal or instrumental. Also solist.

Solomonic (sol-ō-mon'ik), a. [< Solomon (see def.) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to Solomon, son of David and his successor as king of Israel: as, Solomonic wisdom.

Solomon's hyssop, Porch, servants. See hyssop, poreh, scrvant.

Solomon's-seal (sol'ō-monz-sēl'), n. 1. A plant of the genus Polygonatum. The common Solomon's-seal in England is P. multiflorum, a plant with erect or curving stems 2 feet high, and flowers from one to eight in a cluster.

1. The upper part of the flowering stem of Solomon's-seal (Polygonatum giganteum). 2. The lower part of the stem with the rhizome. a, a flower; b, a fruit.

A smaller Old World species is P. officinale, whose root (like that of P. multiflorum) is emetic, cathartic, etc., and was formerly much applied to bruises. In America P. giganteum is the great Solomon's-seal, a species 2 to 7 feet high, with leaves 3 to 8 inches long, and two to eight flowers in a cluster; and P. biflorum is the smaller Solomon's-seal, growing 1 to 3 feet high, with the peduncles commonly two-flowered. The larger species are rather striking plants; P. multiflorum has been much cultivated. See also cut under rhizome.

2. A symbol formed of two triangles interlaced or superposed, presenting a six-rayed figure, ✡ Compare pentacle. —False Solomon's-seal. (a) See Smilacina. (b) See Maianthemum.

so-long (sō-lông'), interj. [Prob. a sailors' perversion of salaam.] Good-by. Also so long. [Slang.]

Solonian (sō-lō'ni-an), a. [< L. Solon, < Gr. Σόλων, Solon, + -ian.] Of or pertaining to Solon, a famous lawgiver of Athens (about 594 B. C.): as, the Solonian Constitutions; Solonian legislation.

Solonic (sō-lon'ik), a. [< L. Solon (see Solonian) + -ic.] Same as Solonian: as, the Solonic talents.

Solon porcelain. See porcelain[1].

Solpuga (sol-pū'gă), n. [NL. (Herbst), < L. solpuga, salpuga, solipuga, solipugna (as if < sol, sun, + pugnare, fight), solifuga (as if < sol, sun, + fugere, flee), a kind of venomous insect, an ant or spider.] 1. The name-giving genus of Solpugidæ, having the tarsi more than three-jointed. See Galeodes. —2. [l. c.] A member of this genus; a solifuge or weasel-spider.

Solpugida (sol-pū'ji-dă), n. pl. [NL., < Solpuga + -ida.] An order of arachnids. They have tracheal respiration, the cephalothorax and abdomen distinct (the former segmented into a large cephalic and small thoracic part), the abdomen annulated, the chelicores one-jointed and chelate, the palpi long and slender, extending forward, the first pair of legs palpiform and porrect, the other legs ending in pairs of claws, and the eyes two in number. The whole body and the limbs are clothed with hairs. These arachnida resemble large hairy spiders externally, but are more nearly related to scorpions. The head is largely made up of the massive chelate falces. The only or the leading family is Galeodidæ or Solpugidæ. Also Solpugidea, Solpugides, and in later variant form Solifugæ. Galeodea is a synonym.

Datames girardi, one of the Solpugidæ. (About two thirds natural size.)

Solpugidæ (sol-pū'ji-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Solpuga + -idæ.] A family of arachnidans, named from the genus Solpuga: synonymous with Galeodidæ.

Solpugidea (sol-pū-jid'ē-ă), n. pl. [NL., < Solpuga + -id-ea.] Same as Solpugida. Also called Galeodea.

solstead† (sol'sted), n. [< L. sol, sun, + E. stead. Cf. sunstead and solstice.] Same as solstice. [Rare.]

If it be gathered about the summer solstead. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxvi. 5.

solstice (sol'stis), n. [Formerly also solsticy; < ME. solstice, < OF. (and F.) solstice = Sp. Pg. solsticio = It. solstizio, < L. solstitium, the solstice, a point in the ecliptic at which the sun seems to stand still, < sol, the sun, + -stitium, < status, pp. of sistere, make to stand still, a reduplicated form of stare = E. stand: see sol[1], stand, and sist. Cf. armistice.] 1. In astron.: (a) The time at which the sun is at its greatest distance from the equator, and when its diurnal motion in declination ceases, which happens about June 21st, when it enters Cancer (the summer solstice), and about December 22d, when it enters Capricorn (the winter solstice). (b) A solstitial point. Hence —2. Figuratively, culmination or turning-point; furthest limit.

He died before his time, perhaps, not yet come to the solstice of his age. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 373.

3†. A stopping or standing still of the sun.

The supernatural solstice of the sun in the days of Joshua. Sir T. Browne.

solsticion†, n. [ME. solsticioun, also solstacion, < OF. solsticion*, < L. solstitium, the solstice: see solstice.] A solstitial point.

In this heved of Cancer is the grettest declinacioun northward of the sonne, and therfor is he cleped the solsticioun of Somer. Chaucer, Astrolabe, i. 17.

solsticy†, n. [< L. solstitium, solstice: see solstice.] Same as solstice.

The high-heated year
Is in her solsticy.
Middleton and Rowley, World Test at Tennis, Ind.

solstitial (sol-stish′al), a. [< F. solstitial, solsticial = Sp. Pg. solsticial = It. solstiziale, < L. solstitialis, < solstitium, solstice: see solstice.] 1. Of or pertaining to a solstice: as, a solstitial point.—2. Happening at a solstice—especially, with reference to the northern hemisphere, at the summer solstice, or midsummer.

The sun
Had . . . from the south to bring Solstitial summer's heat. Milton, P. L., x. 656.

Solstitial armil. See armil, 1.—Solstitial point, one of the two points in the ecliptic which are furthest from the equator, and at which the sun arrives at the time of the solstices. They are diametrically opposite to each other, and the distance of each from the equator is equal to the obliquity of the ecliptic.

solubility (sol-ū-bil′i-ti), n. [= F. solubilité = Sp. solubilidad = Pg. solubilidade = It. solubilità; < NL. solubilita(t-)s*, < L. solubilis, soluble: see soluble.] 1. The property of being soluble; that property of a body which renders it susceptible of solution; susceptibility of being dissolved in a fluid.—2. In bot., a capability of separating easily into parts, as that of certain legumes to divide transversely into parts or joints.—3. Capability of being solved, resolved, answered, cleared up, or disentangled, as a problem, a question, or a doubt.

soluble (sol′ū-bl), a. [< F. soluble = Sp. soluble = Pg. soluvel = It. solubile, < L. solubilis, dissolvable, < solvere, solve, dissolve: see solve.] 1. Capable of being dissolved in a fluid; capable of solution; dissolvable.—2. Figuratively, capable of being solved or resolved, as an algebraical equation; capable of being disentangled, cleared up, unfolded, or settled by explanation, as a doubt, question, etc.; solvable.

Had he denounced it as a fruitless question, and (to understanding) soluble by none, the world might have been spared a large library of resultless disputation.
Sir W. Hamilton.

More soluble is this knot
By gentleness than war. Tennyson, Princess, v.

3†. Relaxed; loose; open.

Ale is their eating and their drinking, surely, which keeps their bodies clear and soluble.
Beau. and Fl., Scornful Lady, iv. 1.

And then, if Balaam's ass hath but an audible voice and a soluble purse, he shall be preferred before his master, were he ten prophets. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 469.

Soluble blue, cotton, glass, indigo. See the nouns.—Soluble bougie, a bougie composed of substances which melt at the body-temperature: used for the purpose of administering medicament to the urethral mucous membrane.—Soluble guncotton. Same as dinitrocellulose.—Soluble oil. See castor-oil.—Soluble soap. See soap, 1.

solubleness (sol′ū-bl-nes), n. Soluble character or property; solubility.

solum (sō′lum), n. [L., the ground, the earth, a region: see soil[1], sole[1].] In Scots law, ground; a piece of ground.

solund-goose (sō′lund-gös). n. Same as solan-goose.

solus (sō′lus), a. [L.: see sole[3].] Alone: used chiefly in dramatic directions: as, enter the king solus. The feminine form is sola.

solute (sō-lūt′), a. [< ME. solute, < L. solutus, pp. of solvere, loose, release, set free: see solve.] 1†. Loose; free.

Solute or sondy landes thai require,
So that abonte or under hem be do
A certayne of fatte lande as thai desire.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 193.

As to the interpretation of the Scriptures solute and at large, there have been divers kinds introduced and devised, some of them rather curious and unsafe than sober and warranted. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

2†. Relaxed; hence, joyous; merry.

Bacchus, purple god of joyous wit,
A brow solute, and ever-laughing eye.
Young, Night Thoughts, ii. 579.

3. In bot., free; not adhering: opposed to adnate: as, a solute stipule.—4. Soluble: as, a solute salt.

solute† (sō-lūt′), v. t. [< L. solutus, pp. of solvere, loosen, solve: see solve, solute, a.] To dissolve; also, to resolve; answer; absolve.

What will not boldness bid a man say, when he hath made an argument against himself which he cannot solute?
Bp. Ridley, in Bradford's Works (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 393.

solution (sō-lū′shon), n. [< ME. solucion, < OF. solution, solucion, F. solution = Pr. solution = Sp. solucion = Pg. solução = It. soluzione, < L. solutio(n-), a loosing, dissolving, < solvere, pp. solutus, loose, resolve, dissolve: see solve.] 1. The act of separating the parts of any body; disruption; rupture; fracture; breach: as, a solution of continuity (see below).—2. The transformation of matter from a solid or gaseous state to the liquid state by means of a liquid called the solvent or menstruum; the state of being dissolved. The nature of the phenomenon depends upon whether chemical action is or is not present. Solution in the physical sense—the common and proper use of the word—is illustrated by dissolving sugar or salt in water, or silver in mercury; here, and in similar cases, when by the removal of the liquid (as by evaporation) the original solid is obtained, the process is essentially a change of molecular state, from the solid to the liquid, and hence accompanied by the absorption of heat; this is strikingly seen in freezing-mixtures. The word is not infrequently used, however, when the phenomenon is one of chemical combination only, as when silver dissolves in nitric acid, forming a new substance, silver nitrate; this, as is generally true of chemical union, is accompanied by the evolution of heat. The two phenomena, physical and chemical, may both be present in solution at the same time, and the line between them often cannot be sharply drawn; glacial acetic acid dissolves in water and at the same time combines with it, the liberation of heat of the chemical part of the process overbalancing the absorption of heat in the physical. The solution of a gas in a liquid, as of ammonia gas in water (also called absorption), is essentially the physical process of the change of the gas to the liquid, and hence is accompanied with the evolution of heat. The term solution is also sometimes applied to the absorption of gases by solids, as when palladium absorbs or dissolves hydrogen gas, forming a true alloy with it. The solubility of any solid is constant at a given temperature, and may be accurately determined by experiment. It may be increased or diminished by the presence of other substances in solution. The solubility of any gas also is constant under the same conditions. It varies with the temperature, the pressure, the nature of the liquid, and the matters in solution in it. In a mixture of gases, each is dissolved in the same quantity as if it were present alone under the same tension as in the mixture.

3. The liquid produced as a result of the process or action above described; the preparation made by dissolving a solid in a liquid: as, a solution of salt, soda, or alum; solution of iron, etc.—4. A liquid or dissolved state or condition; unsettled state; suspense.

His [Lessing's] was a mind always in solution, which the divine order of things, as it is called, could not precipitate into any of the traditional forms of crystallization, and in which the time to come was already fermenting.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 313.

5. The act of solving, working out, explaining, clearing up, or settling, or the state of being solved, explained, cleared up, or settled; resolution; explanation: as, the solution of a difficult problem or of a doubt in casuistry.

It is accordinge to nature no man to do that wherby he shulde take . . . a praye of a nother mannes ignorannce. Of this matter Tulli writeth many propre examples and quicke solutions. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, iii. 4.

In his singular "Ode inscribed to W. H. Channing" there is a hint of a possible solution of the slavery problem. O. W. Holmes, Emerson, viii.

6. A method of solving or finally clearing up or settling something. Specifically—7. The answer to a problem or puzzle of any kind, together with the proof that that answer is correct.—8. Dissolution; a dissolving.

Easy and frequent solutions of conjugal society.
Locke, Civil Government, § 80.

9†. Release; deliverance; discharge. Imp. Dict.—10. In med., the termination of a disease, especially when accompanied by critical symptoms; the crisis of a disease.—11. In civil law, payment; satisfaction of a creditor.—Alcoholic solution. See tincture.—Algebraic solution of an equation, a solution by means of an algebraic formula, especially by radicals.—Aqueous solution, a solution whose solvent or menstruum is water.—Barreswill's solution, a test for sugar similar to Fehling's solution.—Burnett's solution. See Burnett's liquid, under liquid.—Burow's solution, a solution of aluminium subacetate, used as a local astringent in skin-affections.—Cardan's solution, the ordinary algebraic solution of a cubic. See cubic.—Cayley's solution. (a) A solution of the general cubic. Let U = 0 be the cubic, D its discriminant, and J its cubicovariant, then the solution follows from

$$\sqrt[3]{U\sqrt{D}+J}+\sqrt[3]{U\sqrt{D}-J}.$$

These cube roots can always be extracted. (b) A solution of the general quartic, due to Professor Cayley. Let U = 0 be the quartic, H its Hessian, S its quadrinvariant, T its cubinvariant or catalecticant, and c_1, c_2, c_3 the roots of the cubic $c^3 - Sc + T = 0$, then the solution follows from

$$(c_2-c_3)\sqrt{H-c_1U}+(c_3-c_1)\sqrt{H-c_2U}+(c_1-c_2)\sqrt{H-c_3U}=0.$$

The square roots can always be extracted.—Chemical solution, the solution of a solid body in a liquid which is caused by or accompanied with a chemical reaction between the solid and the solution, as of zinc in dilute sulphuric acid.—Clemens's solution, a solution of arsenic bromide, used in the treatment of diabetes.—Compound solution of iodine. Same as Lugol's solution.—Compound solution of sodium borate. Same as Dobell's solution.—Descartes's solution, an algebraical solution of the general biquadratic equation, differing from Ferrari's only in the method of investigation.—Dobell's solution, a solution containing sodium borate 120 grains, sodium bicarbonate 120 grains, crystallized carbolic acid 24 grains, glycerin ½ fluidounce, water to make 16 fluidounces.—Donovan's solution, a solution of arsenic iodide 1, red iodide of mercury 1, water 98 parts: alterative. Also called solution of iodide of arsenic and mercury.—Ethereal solution, a solution whose solvent or menstruum is an ether, usually sulphuric ether.—Euler's solution, a solution of a biquadratic after the second term has been got rid of. It differs little from Ferrari's solution.—Fehling's solution, an aqueous solution of copper sulphate, Rochelle salts, and sodium hydrate. When heated with any reducing sugar, as dextrose, copper suboxid is deposited from it. It is used in the analysis of saccharine bodies, and as a qualitative test of the presence of sugar.—Ferrari's solution, a solution of the general biquadratic. See biquadratic equation, under equation.—Fowler's solution, a solution of arsenious acid 1, potassium bicarbonate 1, compound tincture of lavender 3, water 95 parts: one of the best vehicles for administering arsenic. Also called liquor potassii arsenitis, solution of arsenite of potassium, and ague-drop.—General solution. See differential equation, under equation.—Goadby's solution, a preparation for preserving animal substances, made with bay-salt, corrosive sublimate or arsenious acid, and water. Thomas, Med. Dict.—Hall's solution of strychnine, a solution of strychnine acetate 16 grains, dilute acetic acid ½ fluidounce, alcohol 4 fluidounces, compound tincture of cardamom 60 minims, water to make 16 fluidounces.—Heavy solution, in mineral., a liquid of high density, as a solution of mercuric iodide in potassium iodide (called the Sonstadt or Thoulet solution), having a maximum specific gravity of 3.2, or of borotungstate of cadmium (Klein solution), specific gravity 3.6, used as a gravity-solution (which see).—Improper solution, a function which solves a given differential equation, but also solves an equation either of lower order or of the same order but of lower degree.—Javelle's solution, potassium carbonate 58, chlorinated lime 86, water 862 parts. Also called solution of chlorinated potassa.—Labarraque's solution. Same as Labarraque's fluid (which see, under fluid).—Löffler's solution, a saturated alcoholic solution of methyl blue 30 parts, and 100 parts of a 1:10,000 aqueous solution of potassium hydrate: used in staining bacteria.—Lugol's solution, a solution of iodine 5, potassium iodide 10, water 85 parts. Also called compound solution of iodine.—Magendie's solution of morphine, morphine sulphate 16 grains, water 1 fluidounce: used to administer morphine hypodermically.—Mechanical solution, the mere union of a solid with a liquid in such a manner that its aggregate form is changed without any alteration of the chemical properties of either the solid or its solvent: thus, sugar dissolves in water without either undergoing any chemical change.—Mechanical solution of a problem. See mechanical.—Mineral solution. See mineral.—Nessler's solution. Same as Nessler's reagent (which see, under reagent).—Numerical solution, a solution of an equation by means of numerical approximation.—Particular solution. See differential equation, under equation.—Pasteur's solution, in bot., a liquid holding in solution a small percentage of certain inorganic salts and a larger percentage of certain organic substances, employed in the cultivation of the lower forms of vegetable life, such as bacteria, yeast-cells, and fungi, for purposes of study. The composition is—potassium phosphate 20 parts, calcium phosphate 2 parts, magnesium sulphate 2 parts, ammonium tartrate 100 parts, cane-sugar 1,500 parts, distilled water 8,378 parts.—Pearson's arsenical solution, crystallized sodium arseniate 1, water 599 parts.—Pierlot's solution, an aqueous solution of ammonium valerianate to which is added some of the alcoholic extract of valerian.—Proper solution, a function which satisfies a differential equation, and no equation of lower order nor of the same order but of lower degree.—Saturated solution, a solution which at the given temperature cannot be made to contain more of the given substance than it already contains, the adhesion of the liquid to the substance being just balanced by the cohesion of the particles of the solid body in contact with it.—Simpson's solution. Same as Ferrari's solution.—Singular solution. See differential equation, under equation.—Solution of acetate of ammonia, in phar., a solution composed of dilute acetic acid 100 parts, ammonium carbonate added to the point of neutralization: a valuable diaphoretic and diuretic. Also called spirit of Mindererus.—Solution of albumen, a test solution consisting of the white of one egg triturated with four ounces of water, and filtered: used in pharmaceutical work.—Solution of an equation. See equation.—Solution of continuity, in surg., the separation of parts normally continuous, as by a fracture, laceration, etc.—Solution of lime, a clear saturated solution of slaked lime in water, useful as an antacid, astringent, and tonic. Commonly called lime-water.—Solution of potassa, in phar., an aqueous solution of potassium hydrate, KHO, containing 5 per cent. of the hydrate: an antacid, diuretic, and antilithic. Also called liquor potassæ.—Solution of soda, in phar., an aqueous solution containing 5 per cent. of sodium hydrate.—Solution of sodium carbolate, in phar., crystals of carbolic acid 30, sodium hydrate 2, water 28 parts. Also called phenol sodique.—Solution of subacetate of lead, a solution composed of lead acetate 170, lead oxid 120, water 1,710 parts: a useful astringent and sedative for external use. Also called Goulard's extract.—Sonstadt solution, a solution of mercury iodide in potassium iodide. See specific gravity, under gravity.—Standardized solution, a solution whose strength or composition has been accurately determined, and which is used as a standard of comparison.—Thompson's solution of phosphorus, a solution containing phosphorus, absolute alcohol, spirit of peppermint, and glycerin.—Trigonometrical solution, a solution of an equation by means of trigonometric functions. For an example, see cubic equation, under equation.—Van Swieten's solution, a solution of mercury perchlorid.—Vlemingkx's solution, a solution composed of lime 1, sulphur 2, water 20 parts boiled down to 12 parts.

solutive (sol′ū-tiv), a. [< solute + -ive.] 1. Tending to dissolve; loosening; laxative.

Abstersive, and opening, and solutive as mead.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 848.

2. Capable of being dissolved or loosened. Imp. Dict.

solvability (sol-va-bil′i-ti), n. [< solvable + -ity (see -bility).] 1. Capability of being solved; solubility: as, the solvability of an equation.—2†. Ability to pay all just debts; solvency.

solvable (sol′va-bl), a. [< F. solvable, payable; as solve + -able.] 1†. Payable.

Some of those corrodies (where the property was altered into a set summe of money) was solvable out of the exchequer. Fuller, Ch. Hist., VI. 326. (Davies.)

2†. Solvent.

Was this well done of him [David, at Adullam], to be protector-general of outlaws, thereby defying justice, defrauding creditors, defeating God's command, which provided that the debtor, if not solvable, should be sold for satisfaction? Fuller, Pisgah Sight, II. xiii. 32.

3. Capable of being solved, resolved, or explained: as, equations above the fourth degree are not solvable by means of radicals.

Also solvible.

solvableness (sol′va-bl-nes), n. Solvability.

Solvay process. See soda, 1.

solve (solv), v. t.; pret. and pp. solved, ppr. solving. [< ME. solven, < OF. solver, vernacularly soudre, F. soudre = Sp. Pg. solver = It. solvere, < L. solvere, pp. solutus, loosen, relax, solve, < so-, for se-, apart (see se-, and cf. sober), + luere, loosen, = Gr. λύειν, loosen, set free, release: see lose[1], loose. Hence ult. (< L. solvere) E. solvable, solvent, soluble, solute, solution, etc., absolve, absolute, assoil, dissolve, dissolute, resolve, resolute, etc.] 1. To loosen; disentangle; unravel; hence, to explain or clear up the difficulties in; resolve; explain; make clear; remove perplexity from: as, to solve a difficulty, a puzzle, or a problem.

If her wretched captives could not solve and interpret these riddles, she with great cruelty fell upon them in their hesitation and confusion, and tore them to pieces.
Bacon, Physical Fables, x.

The most subtile and powerful intellects have been labouring for centuries to solve these difficulties.
Macaulay, Sadler's Law of Population.

2. To determine; put an end to; settle.

He . . . would . . . solve high dispute
With conjugal caresses. Milton, P. L., viii. 56.

Centuries elapsed before the attempt to solve the great schism of the East and West by a Council.
Pusey, Eirenicon, p. 91.

3. To determine or work out by rule; operate on by calculation or mathematical processes, so as to bring out the required result: as, to solve a problem in mathematics.—4. To dissolve; melt. [Rare.]

Under the influence of the acid, which partly destroys, partly solves the membranes.
Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 351.

solve† (solv), n. [< solve, v.] Solution.

But why thy odour matcheth not thy show,
The solve is this, that thou dost common grow.
Shak., Sonnets, lxix.

solvency (sol′ven-si), n. [< solven(t) + -cy.] The state of being solvent; ability to pay all just debts or just claims.

Our speech . . . was of tithes and creeds, of beeves and grain, of commodities wet and dry, and the solvency of the retail dealers. Scott, Rob Roy, iii.

solvend (sol′vend), n. [< L. solvendum, fut. pass. part. of solvere, loosen, dissolve: see solve.] A substance to be dissolved.

Solutions differ from chemical compounds in retaining the properties both of the solvent and of the solvend.
C. Tomlinson.

solvent (sol′vent), a. and n. [= Sp. It. solvente, < L. solven(t-)s, ppr. of solvere, loosen, dissolve: see solve.] I. a. 1. Having the power of dissolving: as, a solvent body.—2. Able or sufficient to pay all just debts: as, a solvent person or estate. Specifically—(a) Able to pay one's debts as they become due in the ordinary course of business. (b) Having property in such amount and situation that all one's debts can be collected out of it by legal process. See insolvency. (c) Of sufficient value to pay all just debts: as, the estate is solvent.

II. n. Any fluid or substance that dissolves or renders other bodies liquid; a menstruum. Water is of all solvents the most common and most useful. Alcohol is the solvent of resinous bodies and of some other similarly constituted substances; naphtha, oil of turpentine, and ether are solvents of caoutchouc; chlorin and aqua regia, or nitromuriatic acid, are solvents of gold.

The universal solvent sought by the alchemists.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 315.

solver (sol′vėr), n. [< solve + -er[1].] One who solves, in any sense of the verb.

solvible (sol′vi-bl), a. See solvable.

solyt, adv. An obsolete form of solely.

som[1]†. An old spelling of some, sum[2].

som[2], n. [Russ. somŭ, the silure.] The sheatfish, Silurus glanis.

It [isinglass] is a Russian kind, obtained from the bladders of the som fish. Sci. Amer., N. S., LVIII. 138.

soma[1] (sō′mä), n.; pl. somata (-ma-tä). [NL., < Gr. σῶμα, the body, a dead body, body as opposed to spirit, material substance, mass, etc., also a person, body, human being.] Body. Specifically—(a) In anat. and zoöl., the entire axial part of the body of an animal; the corpus, minus the membra; the head, neck, trunk, and tail, without the limbs. (b) In theol., the body as distinguished from the psyche or soul and the pneuma or spirit.

soma[2] (sō′mä), n. [< Skt. soma (= Zend haoma), juice, < √ su, press out. Cf. Gr. ὀπός, juice, sap (see opium), L. sucus, succus, juice (see succulent).] 1. In ancient India, a drink having intoxicating properties, expressed from the stems of a certain plant, and playing an important part in sacrifices, being offered especially to the god Indra. It was personified and deified, and worshiped as a god.—2. An East Indian plant, the probable source of the beverage soma. It is believed to be of the milkweed family and of the species now classed as Sarcostemma brevistigma (the Asclepias acida of Roxburgh). This is a twining plant, with jointed woody stems of the size of a quill, and numerous succulent branches which are pendulous when unsupported. The flowers are small, greenish-white, and fragrant, in elegant small umbel-like cymes at the ends of the branchlets. The plant yields a mild acidulous milky juice, which appears to have formed the basis of the drink called soma (see def. 1). The juice of more than one species may have been thus used. The plant grows in dry rocky places in India and Burma. Also called moon-plant (from mythological associations) and swallowwort.

3. In later Hind. myth., the moon, or [cap.] the deity of the moon.

somacule (sō′ma-kūl), n. [< NL. somaculum*, dim. of soma, < Gr. σῶμα, body: see soma[1].] The smallest portion of protoplasm which can retain its physiological properties—that is, the chemical molecule of protoplasm. Foster.

Somaj (so-mäj′), n. [< Hind. somāj, a church, an assembly, < Skt. samāja, assembly, < sam, together, + √ aj, drive. Cf. Brahmo-Somaj.] See Brahmo-Somaj.

soma-plant (sō′mä-plant), n. Same as soma, 2.

Somaschian (sō-mas′ki-an), n. [< Somascha (see def.) + -ian.] A member of a Roman Catholic congregation, founded at Somascha, near Milan, in Italy, in the first half of the sixteenth century: it adopted the rules of St. Augustine.

Somateria (sō-ma-tē′ri-ä), n. [NL. (Leach, 1819), so called in allusion to the down on the body; < Gr. σῶμα(τ-), body, + ἔριον, wool.] A genus of Anatidæ of the subfamily Fuligulinæ, including various marine ducks of large size, with copious down on the under parts, with which the female lines the nest, and large, diversiform, variously feathered or gibbous bill; the eiders or eider-ducks. The common eider is S. mollissima; the king-duck is S. spectabilis; the spectacled eider is S. fischeri; Steller's eider is S. stelleri. The genus is often dismembered into Somateria proper, Erionetta, Lampronetta, and Heniconetta (or Polysticta), respectively represented by the four species named. They inhabit arctic and northerly regions, and are related to the scoters (Œdemia). See Polysticta, and cut under eider-duck.

somatic (sō-mat′ik), a. [= F. somatique, < Gr. σωματικός, pertaining to the body, bodily, < σῶμα, the body: see soma[1].] 1. Of or pertaining to the body or material organism, as distinguished from the soul, spirit, or mind; physical; corporeal; bodily.

It was shown that in the British official nosology mental diseases were classified as disorders of the intellect, the idea of somatic disease as associated with insanity being studiously ignored. Dr. Tuke.

We need here to call to mind the continuity of our presentations, and especially the existence of a background of organic sensations or somatic consciousness, as it is variously termed. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 68.

2. Of or pertaining to the soma: as, the longitudinal somatic axis lies in the meson.—3. Of or pertaining to the cavity or interior hollow of the body of an animal, and especially to the body-walls of such cavity; parietal, as distinguished from visceral or splanchnic; cœlomatic; somatopleural.—4. Pertaining to mass.—Somatic anthropology, that division of anthropology which deals with anatomical points.—Somatic cavity, the cœlomatic cavity, body-cavity, or cœlom: distinguished from enteric cavity, from which it is usually shut off completely. The interiors of the thorax and abdomen are somatic cavities. See cuts under Actinozoa, Campanularia, and Hydrozoa.

In the Cœlenterata, the somatic cavity, or enterocœle, is in free communication with the digestive cavity.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 56.

Somatic cells, in bot., cells forming a part of the body of the individual, not specifically modified for any other purpose: said sometimes of those cells of plants which take part in vegetative reproduction.—Somatic death, death of the body as a whole: contrasted with death of any of its parts.—Somatic musculature, the muscles of the somatopleure; that one of the two chief layers of muscles which is subjacent to the dermic or outer epithelium: contrasted with splanchnic musculature.—Somatic velocity, the mass of matter through which a disturbance is propagated in a unit of time while advancing along a prism of unit sectional area; mass-velocity. Rankine.

somatical (sō-mat′i-kal), a. [< somatic + -al.] Same as somatic. Bailey, 1727.

somatics (sō-mat′iks), n. [Pl. of somatic (see -ics).] Same as somatology, 1.

somatism (sō′ma-tizm), n. [< Gr. σῶμα(τ-), the body, + -ism.] Materialism.

somatist (sō′ma-tist), n. [< Gr. σῶμα(τ-), the body, + -ist.] One who admits the existence of corporeal or material beings only; one who denies the existence of spiritual substances; a materialist.

And so our unnatural somatists know none of the most excellent substances, which actuate all the rest, but only the more base and gross, which are actuated by them.
Baxter, Dying Thoughts.

somato-ætiological (sō″ma-tō-ē″ti-ō-loj′i-kal), a. [< Gr. σῶμα(τ-), body, + E. ætiology + -ic-al.] Pertaining to or regarding the body as a cause (as of disease). E. C. Mann, Psychol. Med., p. 51.

somatocyst (sō′ma-tō-sist), n. [< Gr. σῶμα(τ-), the body, + κίστις, bladder: see cyst.] The inflated stem or body of some siphonophorans, or oceanic hydrozoans, serving as a pneumatocyst or air-sac to float or buoy these organisms, as in the case of the Portuguese man-of-war. See Calycophora, Siphonophora[2], and cuts under Diphyidæ and Physalia.

somatocystic (sō″ma-tō-sis′tik), a. [< somatocyst + -ic.] Vesicular or cystic, as the body-cavity of a siphonophorous hydrozoan; of or pertaining to a somatocyst.

somatogenic (sō″ma-tō-jen′ik), a. [< Gr. σῶμα(τ-), the body, + -γενής, produced: see -genous.] Originating in the soma, body, or physical organism in consequence of its conditions of environment: noting those modifications or biological characters which an organism acquires in reacting upon its material surroundings.

He [Prof. Weismann] uses the term somatogenic to express those characters which first appear in the body itself, and which follow from the reaction of the soma under direct external influences. Nature, XL. 531.

somatologic (sō″ma-tō-loj′ik), a. [< somatology + -ic.] Same as somatological.

somatological (sō″ma-tō-loj′i-kal), a. [< somatology + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to somatology in any sense, especially to somatology as a department of anthropology; physical; corporeal; material.

somatologically (sō″ma-tō-loj′i-kal-i), adv. As regards physique or bodily frame; physically; from the point of view of somatology. Science, XII. 227.

somatology (sō-ma-tol′ō-ji), n. [= F. somatologie; < Gr. σῶμα(τ-), the body, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] 1. The science of living or organized bodies, considered with regard only to their physical nature or structure. It includes natural history in the usual sense, as embracing zoölogy, botany, anatomy, and physiology, and differs from biology only in taking no account of mental or psychological phenomena. Also somatics.

2. More broadly, physics; the doctrine of material bodies or substances.—3. Specifically, the doctrine of the human body, as a department of anthropology; human anatomy and physiology; also, a treatise on this subject.—Anthropurgic somatology. See anthropurgic.

somatome (sō′ma-tōm), n. [For somatotome*, < Gr. σῶμα(τ-), the body, + -τομος, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] An ideal section or segment of the body; one of the structural parts into which a body, especially a vertebrate body, is theoretically divisible. When actually so divided, the somatomes are the somites, metameres, arthromeres, diarthromeres, etc., which may exist in any given case. See somite.

somatomic (sō-ma-tom′ik), a. [< somatome + -ic.] Having the nature, quality, or character of a somatome; dividing or segmenting a body into theoretic or actual somites; somitic; metameric.

somatopagus (sō-ma-top′a-gus), n.; pl. somatopagi (-jī). [NL., < Gr. σῶμα(τ-), the body, + πάγος, that which is fixed, < πηγνύναι (√ παγ), fix.] In teratol., a double monster with separate trunks.

somatoparallelus (sō″ma-tō-par-a-lē′lus), n.; pl. somatoparalleli (-lī). [NL., < Gr. σῶμα(τ-), the body, + παράλληλος, beside one another: see parallel.] In teratol., a somatopagus with the axes of the two bodies parallel.

somatoplasm (sō′ma-tō-plazm), n. [< Gr. σῶμα(τ-), the body, + πλάσμα, anything formed or molded: see plasm.] Somatic plasma; the substance of the body.

My germ-plasm or idioplasm of the first ontogenetic grade is not modified into the somatoplasm of Prof. Vinis. Nature, XLI. 320.

somatopleura (sō″ma-tō-plö′rä), n.; pl. somatopleuræ (-rē). [NL.: see somatopleure.] Same as somatopleure.

The villosities of connective and vascular tissue, partly formed by the somatopleura. Micros. Sci., N. S., XXX. 352.

somatopleural (sō″ma-tō-plö′ral), a. [< somatopleure + -al.] Of or pertaining to the somatopleure; forming or formed by the somatopleure: as, the somatopleural layer or division of mesoderm. Also somatopleurie.

somatopleure (sō′ma-tō-plör), n. [< NL. somatopleura, < Gr. σῶμα(τ-), the body, + πλευρά, the side.] The outer one of two divisions of the mesoderm of a four-layered germ, the inner one being the splanchnopleure. A germ that is three-layered — that is, consists of an ectoderm and an endoderm, with mesoderm between them — in most animals becomes four-layered by a splitting of the mesoderm into two layers, the outer or somatopleural and the inner or splanchnopleural, separated by a space which is the body-cavity or cœlom. The somatopleure thus constitutes usually the great mass of the body, or the "flesh and bones" of ordinary language, together with its vessels, nerves, and other special structures — not, however, including the cerebrospinal axis of a vertebrate, which is derived from an inversion of ectoderm — while the splanchnopleure forms a portion of the substance of the intestinal tract and its annexes. Also somatopleura.

somatopleuric (sō″ma-tō-plö′rik), a. [< somatopleure + -ic.] Same as somatopleural. Foster, Elem. of Embryol., p. 39.

somatosplanchnopleuric (sō″ma-tō-splangk-nō-plö′rik), a. [< Gr. σῶμα(τ-), the body, + σπλάγχνον, the inward parts, + πλευρά, the side.] Common to the somatopleure and the splanchnopleure. Micros. Sci., XXVIII. 117.

somatotomy (sō-ma-tot′ō-mi), n. [< Gr. σῶμα(τ-), the body, + -τομία, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] The anatomy of the human body; anthropotomy; hominisection.

somatotridymus (sō″ma-tō-trid′i-mus), n.; pl. somatotridymi (-mī). [NL., < Gr. σῶμα(τ-), the body, + τρίδυμος, threefold.] In teratol., a monster having three bodies.

somatotropic (sō″ma-tō-trop′ik), a. [< Gr. σῶμα(τ-), the body, + -τροπος, < τρέπειν, turn, + -ic.] In bot., exhibiting or characterized by somatotropism.

somatotropism (sō-ma-tot′rō-pizm), n. [< somatotropic + -ism.] In bot., a directive influence exerted upon growing organs by the mass of the substratum upon which they grow. This influence is not wholly due to the mere physical attraction between them, but is the result of a stimulating effect on what has been called the nervimotility of the organ. Growing organs may be divided, according to their response to this influence, into two classes, the positively somatotropic, or those which tend to grow perpendicularly inward into the substratum, and negatively somatotropic, or those which tend to grow perpendicularly outward from the substratum.

somber, sombre (som′bėr), a. [= D. somber, formerly also sommer, < F. sombre = Sp. sombrío (= Pg. sombrio), shady, gloomy, < sombra (= Pg. sombra), shade, dark part of a picture, also a ghost (cf. asombrar, frighten); cf. OF. essombre, a shady place; prob. < L. exumbrare*, < ex, out, + umbra, shade (or, according to some, the Sp. Pg. forms are, like Pr. sotzumbrar, shade, < L. subumbrare*, < sub, under, + umbra, shade): see umbra.] 1. Dark; dull; dusky; gloomy: as, a somber hue; somber clouds.

Sombre, old, colonnaded aisles. Tennyson, The Daisy.

2. Dismal; melancholy; dull: opposed to cheerful.

Whatever was poetical in the lives of the early New-Englanders had something shy, if not sombre, about it. Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 232.

=Syn. 1. Darksome, cloudy, murky.

somber, sombre (som′bėr), v. t.; pret. and pp. sombered, sombred, ppr. sombering, sombring. [< somber, sombre, a.] To make somber, dark, or gloomy; shade.

somberly, sombrely (som′bėr-li), adv. In a somber manner; darkly; gloomily.

somberness, sombreness (som′bėr-nes), n. Somber character, appearance, or state; darkness; gloominess.

The intense gloom which follows in the track of ennui deepened the natural sombreness of all men's thoughts. C. F. Keary, Prim. Belief, p. 508.

sombre, etc. See somber, etc.

sombrerite (som-brā′rīt), n. [< Sombrero (see def.) + *-ite*2.] An earthy mineral consisting chiefly of calcium phosphate with impurities, as alumina, etc. It forms a large part of some small islands in the Antilles, especially of Sombrero, and has been used as an artificial manure and for the manufacture of phosphorus. It is supposed to be derived from the decayed bones of turtles and other marine animals. Also called Sombrero guano.

sombrero (som-brā′rō), n. [< Sp. sombrero, a broad-brimmed hat, also a sounding-board, < sombra, shade: see somber.] A broad-brimmed felt hat, of Spanish origin, but now widely used throughout the continent of America.

They rowe too and fro, and haue all their marchandizes in their boates, with a great Sombrero or shadow ouer their heads to keepe the sunne from them, which is as broad as a great cart wheele. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 258.

Both were dressed in the costume of the country — flannel shirts, with handkerchiefs loosely knotted round their necks, thick trousers and boots, and large sombreros. The Century, XXXIX. 525.

Sombrero guano. Same as sombrerite.

sombrous (som′brus), a. [< somber + -ous.] Somber; gloomy. [Poetical.]

A certain uniform strain of sombrous gravity. T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, III. 171.

You ate at dinner, cannot brook with you.
Arden of Feversham, iv. 2.

It is some mercy when men kill with speed.
Webster, Duchess of Malfi.

Let her who has no Hair, or has but some,
Plant Centinels before her Dressing-Room.
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love, iii.

3. In logic, at least one, perhaps all; but a few logicians sometimes employ a semidefinite some which implies a part, but not all. As commonly used in logic, a statement about some of a class, say that "some S is P," means that it is possible so to select an S that it shall be P; while "every S is P" means that whatever S be taken, it will be P. But when some and every occur in the same statement, it makes a difference which is chosen first. Thus, "every man knows some fact" may mean (1) that, first choosing any man, a fact may then be found which that man knows (which may be expressed by saying that every man knows some fact or other); or it may mean (2) that a fact may be first selected such that, then, taking any man, he will know that fact (which may be expressed by saying that all men know some certain fact). When several somes and alls occur in the same statement, ordinary syntax fails to express the meaning with precision, and logicians resort to a special notation.

4. A certain indefinite or indeterminate number of: used before plural substantives: as, some years ago.

They hurried us aboard a bark,
Bore us some leagues to sea.
Shak., Tempest, i. 2. 145.

The Lights at Paris, for 5 Months in the year only, cost 50000L. Sterling. This way of Lighting the Streets is in use also in some other Cities in France.
Lister, Journey to Paris (1698), p. 24.

Hence — 5. A certain number of, stated approximately: in a quasi-adverbial use before a numeral or other word of number: as, a place some seventy miles distant; some four or five of us will be there.

I would detain you here some month or two.
Shak., M. of V., iii. 2. 9.

Some dozen Romans of us and your lord
. . . have mingled sums
To buy a present for the emperor.
Shak., Cymbeline, i. 6. 185.

We know
That what was worn some twenty years ago
Comes into grace again.
Beau. and Fl., Thierry and Theodoret, Prol.

A distinguished foreigner, tall and handsome, some thirty-seven years of age, who had played no insignificant part in the affairs of France. E. Dowden, Shelley, I. 380.

II. pron. 1†. A certain person; one.

Som man desireth for to have richesse,
That cause is of his morthre or gret seeknesse,
And som wolde out of his prisoun fayn,
That in his hous is of his mayne slayn.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 397.

2. A certain quantity, part, or number, as distinguished from the rest: as, some of them are dead; we ate some of our provisions, and gave away the rest.

Loo! he that sowith, goth out to sowe his seed. And the while he soweth, sum felden byside the weye.
Wyclif, Mat. xiii. 4.

Though some report they [elephants] cannot kneele nor lye downe, they can doe both.
Capt. John Smith, True Travels, I. 49.

That he might, if possible, allure that Blessed One to cheapen and buy some of his vanities.
Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, i., Vanity Fair.

In this sense some is very commonly repeated, some . . . some (or, formerly, other some, as in Acts xvii. 18) meaning 'a number . . . others,' or 'the rest.'

Summe were glad whanne thei him sigе,
Summe were sory, summe were fayne.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 54.

Shak., Tit. And., iv. 1. 11.

somital (sō′mi-tạl), a. [< somite + -al.] Same as somitic.

somite (sō′mīt), n. [< Gr. σῶμα, body, + -ite[2].] An actual somatome; any one morphological segment of an articulated body, such a body being viewed as composed of a longitudinal series of somites; an arthromere or metamere of an articulate invertebrate or a diarthromere of a vertebrate; such a segment considered with or without the appendages it may possess; in the latter restricted sense, a metamere minus its appendages, or a segment of the soma or trunk without the limbs it may bear. The term sometimes extends to ideal somatomes, or to the metameres of which an organism is theoretically assumed to consist; but it is especially applied to the actual segments of such invertebrates as insects, crustaceans, and worms, whose body-rings are usually evident, though some or other of them may coalesce, as into a cephalothorax, etc. In such cases the primitive or morphological somites are usually recognized and reckoned by their respective pairs of appendages. Separate somites, continued throughout the body, are evident in the rings of earthworms and other annelids. In arthropods the typical number of somites is supposed to be twenty or twenty-one, numbers often actually recognizable. In insects the head is assumed to have six or seven somites, the thorax has normally three (see prothorax, mesothorax, and metathorax), and the abdomen is supposed to have ten or eleven. Each of these somites is invested and indicated by a body-ring or crust of integument, primitively or typically composed of eight sclerites, which may variously coalesce with one another, or with pieces of another somite, or both. Those sclerites which ordinarily remain distinct, and thus can be identified, take special names, as tergite, pleurite, sternite, scutum, præscutum, etc., epineron, epipleuron, etc. Appendages of somites are limbs in the broadest sense, under whatever modifications; and these modifications are usually greatest at the cephalic and caudal ends of the body, as into eyestalks, antennæ, palpi, mandibles, maxillæ, maxillipeds or gnathopodites, etc., of the head, and stings, claspers, or other anal armature. Intermediate somitic appendages are ordinary legs and wings, as of the thorax of insects, and the perelopods, pleopods, chelæ, rhipidura, telson, etc., of the thorax and abdomen of crustaceans. In worms such appendages chiefly occur in the form of parapodia (neuropodia and notopodia). See sclerite, and cuts under Amphithoë, Apus, Buthus, Scorpionidæ, Blattidæ, and cockroach.

somitic (sō-mit′ik), a. [< somite + -ic.] Having the character of a somite; somatomic; metamerie; of or pertaining to somites: as, the somitic divisions of the body; a somitic ring or joint; a somitic appendage.

These septa are metamerically arranged, one for each somitic constriction.
Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 243.

E. Gurney, in Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, II. 68.

somnambulism (som-nam′bū-lizm), n. [= F. somnambulisme = Sp. somnambulismo, sonambulismo = Pg. somnambulismo = It. sonnambulismo; as somnambule + -ism.] The act of walking about, with the performance of apparently purposive acts, while in a state intermediate between sleep and waking. The sleeping condition is shown by the absence of the usual reaction to sense-impressions, and usually by the failure to recall what has been done during the somnambulistic period. With many recent writers, however, the word is used, quite independently of any consideration of movements which the somnambulist may or does execute, as nearly synonymous with trance, mesmerization, or hypnotism, and exactly so with somnolism. It is generally considered under the two main conditions of the idiopathic, spontaneous, or self-induced and the artificial or induced. Compare somnolism. Also called, rarely, noctambulism.

In somnambulism, natural or induced, there is often a great display of intellectual activity, followed by complete oblivion of all that has passed.
W. James, Prin. of Psychology, I. 201.

Somnambulism is, as a rule, a decidedly deeper state than the lighter stage of hypnotism.
E. Gurney, in Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, II. 68.

To the same root are referred sow[2], swine, etc.] 1. A male child; the male issue of a parent, father or mother.

> 3et I a-vow verayly the avaunt that I made,
> I schal 3eply a3ayn & 3elde that I hy3t, > & sothely sende to Saré a soun & an hayre.
> Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 666.

The Town is called Jaff; for on of the Sones of Noe, that highte Japhet, founded it; and now it is clept Joppe.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 30.

A black bull, the son of a black cow. Darwin.

2. A male descendant, however distant; hence, in the plural, descendants in general.

Adam's sons are my brethren.
Shak., Much Ado, ii. 1. 66.

3. One adopted into a family; any young male dependent; any person in whom the relation of a son to a parent is perceived or imagined. Often used as a term of address by an old man to a young one, by a confessor to a penitent, etc.

The child grew, and she brought him unto Pharaoh's daughter, and he became her son. Ex. ii. 10.

Be plain, good son, and homely in thy drift.
Shak., R. and J., ii. 3. 55.

4. A person or thing born or produced, in relation to the producing soil, country, or the like.

To this her glorious son Great Britain is indebted for the happy conduct of her arms. Steele, Tatler, No. 5.

> Perhaps e'en Britain's utmost shore
> Shall cease to blush with strangers' gore,
> See arts her savage sons control.
> Pope, Choruses to Brutus, i.

Her [the earth's] tall sons, the cedar, oak, and pine.
Sir R. Blackmore, Creation, vi.

5. A person whose character partakes so much of some quality or characteristic as to suggest the relationship of son and parent: as, sons of light; sons of pride; the son of perdition.

They are villains, and the sons of darkness.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., ii. 4. 191.

> When night
> Darkens the streets, then wander forth the sons
> Of Belial. Milton, P. L., i. 501.

Every mother's son. See mother[1].—Favorite son, a statesman or politician assumed to be the especial choice of the people of his State for some high office, especially that of President. [Political slang, U. S.]

A Favourite Son is a politician respected or admired in his own State, but little regarded beyond it.
Bryce, Amer. Commonwealth, II. 153.

Son of man. (a) In the Old Testament, one of the descendants of Adam: especially used as a form of address in the Book of Ezekiel (in Dan. vii. 13 of the Messiah). (b) In the New Testament, Christ as the promised Messiah.—Sons of Liberty, in Amer. hist.: (a) In the years preceding the revolution, one of associations formed to forward the American cause. (b) One of the secret associations, similar to the Knights of the Golden Circle, formed in the North during the civil war, for the purpose of giving aid to the Confederacy.—Sons of Sires, or Sons of Seventy-six, a name said to have been applied to or assumed by members of the American or Know-nothing party. [Political slang, U. S.]—Sons of the prophets. See school of the prophets, under prophet.—Sons of the South, the name assumed by members of certain organizations formed in Missouri, about 1854, for the purpose of taking possession of Kansas in the interest of slavery.—The Son, the second person of the Trinity; Christ Jesus. Mat. xi. 27.

The Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world.
1 John iv. 14.

son[2]†, n. An original spelling of sound[5].

-son. A form of the termination -tion, in some words derived through Old French, as in benison, malison, venison, reason, season, treason, etc. See -tion.

sonabile (sō-nā'bē-le), a. [It., < sonare, sound: see sonata.] In music, resonant; sounding.

sonance (sō'nans), n. [= OIt. sonanza, a sounding, ringing; as sonan(t) + -ce.] 1†. A sound; a tune; a call.

> Let the trumpets sound
> The tucket sonance and the note to mount.
> Shak., Hen. V., iv. 2. 35.

2. Sonancy.

sonancy (sō'nan-si), n. [As sonance (see -cy).] The property or quality of having sound, or of being sonant; sonant character; sound.

A concise description of voice, then, is this: it is the audible result of a column of air emitted by the lungs, impressed with sonancy and variety of pitch by the larynx, and individualized by the mouth-organs.
Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., iv.

sonant (sō'nant), a. and n. [= F. sonnant = Sp. Pg. It. sonante, < L. sonan(t-)s, ppr. of sonare, sound, make a noise, < sonus, a sound: see sound[5]. Cf. assonant, consonant, dissonant, resonant.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to or having sound; sounding.—2. In pron., noting certain alphabetic sounds, as the vowels, semivowels, nasals, and voiced mutes and fricatives, the utterance of which includes the element of tone, or a vibration of the vocal chords, as a, l, n, b, z, v (the last three as opposed to p, s, f, which are similar utterances without tone); voiced, vocal, intonated (soft and flat are also sometimes used in the same sense).—3. In entom., same as sonorific, 2.

II. n. In pron., a sonant letter.

sonata (sō-nä'tä), n. [= F. sonate (> D. G. Dan. sonate = Sw. sonat) = Sp. Pg. sonata, < It. sonata, a sonata, < sonata, fem. pp. of sonare, sound, < L. sonare, sound: see sound[5]. Cf. sonnet.] 1. In music, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, any composition for instruments: opposed to cantata. These old sonatas were usually in more than one movement. The character of their themes and their structure varied widely, those called church sonatas tending to grave themes and a contrapuntal treatment, and the chamber sonatas resembling the canzona and the suite.

2. In recent music, an instrumental work, especially for the pianoforte, made up of three or four movements in contrasted rhythms but related keys, one or more of which are written in sonata form. The movements usually include an allegro with or without an introduction, a slow movement (usually adagio, largo, or andante), a minuet or scherzo with or without a trio appended, and a final allegro or presto, which is often a rondo. A certain unity of sentiment or style is properly traceable between the successive movements. The sonata is the most important form of homophonic composition for a single instrument. A sonata for a string quartet is called a quartet, and one for a full orchestra is called a symphony.—Double sonata, a sonata for two solo instruments.—Sonata form, in music, a form or method of composition in which two themes or subjects are developed according to a plan more or less like the following: (a) exposition, containing the first subject, followed by the second, properly in the key of the dominant or in the relative major (if the first be minor); (b) development or working out, consisting of a somewhat free treatment of the two subjects or parts of them, either singly or in conjunction; (c) restatement, containing the two subjects in succession, both in the original key, with a conclusion. The succession of sections and the relations of keys are open to considerable variation, and episodes often occur. The sonata form is distinctive of at least one movement of a sonata or symphony, and usually of the first and last; it also appears in many overtures.

sonatina (sō-nä-tē'nä), n. [It., dim. of sonata: see sonata.] In music, a short or simplified sonata.—Sonatina form, in music, a form or method of composition resembling the sonata form, but on a smaller scale, and usually lacking the development section.

sonation (sō-nā'shon), n. [= It. sonazione; < ML. sonatio(n-), a sounding, < L. sonare, sound: see sound[5], v., sonate.] The giving forth of a sound; sounding. [Rare.]

But when what has the faculty of hearing, on the one hand, operates, and what has the faculty of sounding, on the other hand, sounds, then the actual hearing and the actual sounding take place conjointly; and of these the one may be called audition, the other sonation.
Sir W. Hamilton, tr. from Aristotle, Reid's Works, Note D.

Sonchus (song'kus), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. sonchus, < Gr. σόγχος, the sow-thistle.] A genus of composite plants, of the tribe Cichoriaceæ and subtribe Lactuceæ. It is characterized by flower-heads commonly dilated at the base in fruit, with numerous compressed beakless achenes having from ten to twenty ribs and bearing a soft snowy-white pappus which is deciduous in a ring. There are about 30 species, widely diffused throughout the Old World and in Australasia; four species are naturalized as weeds in the United States, two of which are now almost cosmopolitan. They are annual or perennial herbs, having spreading radical leaves and upright stems clad with coarse clasping leaves which are often toothed with soft or rigid spines. The yellow heads are irregularly clustered at the summits of the few branches. The species are fond of barn-yards and moist rich soil, whence the name sow-thistle. S. tenerrimus is eaten as a salad in Italy, and S. oleraceus was once so used in various parts of Europe. (See hare's-lettuce.) The genus is reputed a galactagogue. One or two species with handsome leaves and flowers, from Madeira and the Canaries, are sometimes cultivated under glass. See sow-thistle.

sond†, n. A Middle English form of sund[1], sand[2].

Sonday†, n. An obsolete form of Sunday.

sondet†, n. Same as sand[2].

sondelt†, n. An obsolete variant of sendal.

sondeli (son'de-li), n. [E. Ind.] The monjourou, muskrat, musk-shrew, or rat-tailed shrew of India, Sorex murinus (Linnæus, 1766), S. myosurus (Pallas, 1785), or Crocidura myosura, an insectivorous mammal, exhaling a strong musky odor. The name specially denotes a variety which is semi-domesticated, and sometimes called gray musk-shrew (C. cærulea), as distinguished from the wild brown musk-shrew.

Sondeli (Crocidura myosura).

sonder-cloud (son'dèr-kloud), n. A cirro-cumulus cloud. Forster, Atmospherie Phænomena (3d ed., 1823), p. 145. [Rare.]

sondry†, a. A Middle English form of sundry.

sonet†, adv. An old spelling of soon.

soneri (son'èr-i), n. [Hind. sunahrī, sunahrū, of gold, < sonā, gold.] Cloth of gold: an Indian term adopted as the name of native stuffs interwoven with gold.

song[1] (sông), n. [Se. also sang; < ME. song, sang, < AS. sang, song, singing, song, a song, poem, poetry, = OS. sang = OFries. song, sang = MD. sanc, D. zang = MLG. sank, LG. sang = OHG. sang, MHG. sanc, G. gesang = Icel. söngr = Sw. sång = Dan. sang = Goth. saggws, song; also collectively, OHG. gasang, kisaneh,* MHG. gesanc, G. gesang, song; from the verb, AS. singan (pret. sang), etc., sing: see sing.] 1. Singing; vocal music in general; utterance in tones of musical quality and succession, with or without words: opposed to speech and to instrumental music.

For the tired slave Song lifts the languid oar.
Wordsworth, Power of Sound, iv.

2. The musical cry of some birds (see singing bird, under sing) and, by extension, of some other animals.

> Trees, brannches, birds, and songs were framed fitt
> For to allure fraile mind to carelesse ease.
> Spenser, F. Q., II. vi. 13.

3. A short poem intended for singing, or set to music; a ballad or lyric. A song is properly distinguished by brevity, free use of rhythmic accent and rime, more or less division into stanzas or strophes, often with a refrain or burden, comparative directness and simplicity of sentiment, and a decidedly lyrical manner throughout.

> Out on you, owls! nothing but songs of death?
> Shak., Rich. III., iv. 4. 509.

> The bard who first adorn'd our native tongue
> Tun'd to his British lyre this ancient song.
> Dryden, To the Duchess of Ormond with Pal. and Arc.

> Perhaps it may turn out a sang,
> Perhaps turn out a sermon.
> Burns, Epistle to a Young Friend.

4. A partienlar melody or musical setting for such a poem, for either one or several voices (in the latter case usually called a part-song or glee). Songs are generally written in song form, but are often irregular also. They usually contain but a single movement, and have an accompaniment of a varying amount of elaboration. They are classified as folk-songs, which spring up more or less unconaciously among the common people, or art-songs, which are deliberately composed by musicians (see lied); as strophic, when made up of a movement repeated for the several strophes, or composed through, when the music varies with the successive strophes; or they are named by reference to their general subject or style, as rustic, patriotic, national, martial, naval, nuptial, hunting, bacchanalian, etc.

5. Poetry; poetical composition; verse.

> This subject for heroic song
> Pleased me. Milton, P. L., ix. 25.

6. A mere trifle; something of little or no value: as, I bought it for a song. [Colloq.]—Comic, Gregorian, melismatic, nuptial, old song. See the adjectives.—Master of song, master of the song†. See master[1].—Song form, in music, a form or method of composition consisting in general of three sections, the first and last being nearly the same, and the second being contrasted with the first.—Song of degrees. See degree.—Song of Solomon, Song of Songs, Canticles (see canticle).—Song of the Three Holy Children, an addition to the book of Daniel, found in the Septuagint and in the Apocrypha, purporting to be the prayer and song of the three Hebrews in the fiery furnace. A part of it is used in Christian liturgies under the above title, in the Western Church usually under the title Benedicite. See canticle.—Syllabic song. See metismatic song.—To sing another song. See sing. (See also even-song, plain-song.)

song-bird (sông'bėrd), n. A bird that sings; a singing bird, or songster.

song-book (sông'bůk), n. [< ME. songbok,* < AS. sangbōc, a song-book, musie-book, a book of cantieles and hymns (= D. zangboek = MLG. sankbok = G. gesangbuch = Iceel. sǫngbōk = Sw. sångbok = Dan. sangbog, a song-book), < sang, song, + bōc, book.] 1. A colleetion of songs or other voeal musie forming a book or volume; speeifically, a hymn-book.—2. In the Anglo-Saxon ehureh, the portass or breviary.

The song-book corresponded with the Salisbury portous and the Roman breviary.
Rock, Church of our Fathers, III. ii. 20.

song-craft (sông'kråft), n. [A mod. revived form of AS. sangeræft, the art of singing, the art of poetry, < sang, song, + ræft, art, eraft.] The art of composing songs; skill in versification.

Written with little skill of song-craft.
Longfellow, Hiawatha, Int.

songer†, n. [< ME. songere, < AS. sangere (= D. zanger = OHG. sangari, MHG. senger, G. sänger = Iceel. sǫngvari = Dan. sanger = Sw. sångare), a singer, psalmist, < sang, song: see song[1]. Cf. singer[1] and songster.] A singer.

songewariet, n. [ME., < OF. songewarie,* observation of dreams, < songe (< L. somnium), dream, + warir, guard, keep: see ware[1].] The observation or interpretation of dreams.

Ac I haue no sauoure in songewarie, for I see it ofte faille.
Piers Plowman (B), vii. 148.

songful (sông'fůl), a. [< song[1] + -ful.] Disposed or able to sing; melodious. Savage. [Rare.]

songish (sông'ish), a. [< song[1] + -ish[1].] Consisting of or containing songs. [Rare.]

The other, which, for want of a proper English word, I must call the songish part, must abound in the softness and variety of numbers, its principal intention being to please the hearing. Dryden, Albion and Albanians, Pref.

songle (song'gl), n. [Formerly also songal, sangow; a var. of single[1], in same sense.] A handful of gleanings. [Prov. Eng.]

I have just this last week obtained a goodly songle of S. Staffordshire words. N. and Q., 7th ser., VIII. 363.

songless (sông'les), a. [< song[1] + -less.] 1. Without song; not singing.

Silent rows the songless gondolier.
Byron, Childe Harold, iv. 3.

2. In ornith.: (a) Not singing; unable to sing; not a singer: as, the female mocking-bird is songless; most birds are songless in winter. (b) Having no singing-apparatus, and consequently unable to sing; not a song-bird; nonoscine; clamatorial or mesomyodian, as a passerine bird: as, the Mesomyodi, or songless Passeres.

songman (sông'man), n.; pl. songmen (-men). 1. A singer, especially a singer of songs; a gleeman.

She hath made me four and twenty nosegays for the shearers, three-man song-men all, and every good ones.
Shak., W. T., iv. 3. 45.

2. A lay viear. See lay[4].

song-muscle (sông'mus″l), n. In ornith., any muscle of the syrinx or lower larynx of a bird concerned in the act of singing, by the operation of whieh the voice is modulated; any muscle of voealization. These syringeal muscles reach their highest development in number and complexity of arrangement in the Oscines, Polymyodi, or Acromyodi, in which group of birds there are normally five pairs—the tensor posterior longus, tensor anterior longus, tensor posterior brevis, tensor anterior brevis, and sternotrachealis.

There is no question of its being by the action of the syringeal muscles . . . that the expansion of the bronchi, both as to length and diameter, is controlled, and, as thereby the sounds uttered by the Bird are modified, they are properly called the Song-muscles.
A. Newton, Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 29.

song-sparrow (sông'spar″ō), n. 1. The hedge-sparrow, Accentor modularis. See cut under Accentor. [Eng.]—2. A small fringilline bird of North Ameriea, of the genus Melospiza, a sweet songster, with a streaked brown, gray, and white plumage without any yellow. The best-known is M. fasciata, one of the most familiar birds of the eastern half of the country; there are several other species or varieties in the west, the most distinct of which is the Kodiak song-sparrow, M. cinerea. The common species is 6¼ inches long and 8¾ in extent of wings, and the markings of the breast are gathered into a characteristic pectoral spot. It nests on the ground, and lays four or five spotted and clouded eggs. Its song is remarkably sweet and hearty, and the plain little bird is deservedly a great favorite. It is also called silver-tongue.—Oregon song-sparrow, Melospiza fasciata guttata, a western variety of the common song-sparrow.

Song-sparrow (Melospiza fasciata).

songster (sông'stėr), n. [< ME. songstre* (?), < AS. sangestre, sangistre, sangystre,* a female singer, < sang, song, + fem. suffix -estre, E. -ster. Cf. songer.] 1. One who or that whieh sings or is skilled in singing.

Every songster had sung out his fit.
B. Jonson, Neptune's Triumph.

Specifically, in ornith.: (a) A singer; a singing bird. (b) pl. Specifically, singing birds: the Oscines, Cantores, Cantatores, Acromyodi, or Polymyodi.

2. A writer of songs or poems.

Silk will draw some sneaking songster thither.
It is a rhyming age, and verses swarm At every stall. B. Jonson, An Elegy (Underwoods, lxi).

songstress (sông'stres), n. [< songster + -ess.] A female singer; also, a female singing bird.

The trill . . .
Of that shy songstress, whose love-tale Might tempt an angel to descend,
While hovering o'er the moonlight vale.
Wordsworth, Power of Sound.

song-thrush (sông'thrush), n. One of the eommon thrushes of Europe, Turdus musicus; the mavis or throstle, closely related to the mistle-thrush, redwing, and fieldfare. It is 9 inches in length, and 14 in extent of wings. The upper parts are yellowish-brown, reddening on the head; the wing-coverts are tipped with reddish-yellow; the fore neck and breast are yellowish, with brownish-black arrow-heads; the lower wing-coverts are reddish-yellow; and the belly is white. See cut under thrush.

sonifaction (son-i-fak'shọn), n. [< L. sonus, sound, + factio(n-), < facere, produce.] The production of sound; a noise-making; especially, the stridulation of insects, as distinguished from vocalization: as, the sonifaction of the cicada or katydid.

A mode of sonifaction . . . similar to that where a boy runs along a fence pushing a stick against the pickets.
Stand. Nat. Hist., II. 307.

sonifer (son'i-fėr), n. [< L. sonus, sound, + ferre = E. bear[1].] An acoustic instrument for collecting sound and conveying it to the ear of a partially deaf person. It is a bell or receiver of metal, from which the sound-waves are conducted to the ear by a flexible pipe. E. H. Knight.

soniferous (sō-nif'e-rus), a. [< L. sonus, sound, + ferre = E. bear[1].] Conveying or producing sound.

son-in-law (sun'in-lâ″), n. [< ME. sone in lawe: see son[1] and law[1].] The husband of one's daughter.

sonless (sun'les), a. [< son[1] + -less.] Having no son; without a son.

If the Emperour die son-lesse, a successor is chosen, of such a spirit as their present affaires do require.
Sandys, Travailes, p. 133.

sonnet†, n. A Middle English form of sun[1].

sonnekin†, n. [Early mod. E., later sonkin,* < son[1] + -kin.] A little son. [Nonce-word.]

παιδίον, sonnekin, or litle sonne.
Udall, tr. of Apophthegms of Erasmus, p. 233, note.

Sonneratia (son-e-rā'shi-ạ), n. [NL. (Linnæus filius, 1781), named after P. Sonnerat (1745–1814), a French traveler and naturalist.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Lythrariex and tribe Lythreæ. It is characterized by flowers having a bell-shaped calyx with from four to eight lobes, as many small petals or sometimes none, numerous stamens, and a many-celled ovary which becomes a roundish berry stipitate in the calyx and filled with a granular pulp. It includes 5 or 6 species, natives of tropical shores, chiefly in eastern Africa and Asia, also in Madagascar and Australia. They are smooth-branched trees or shrubs, with opposite coriaceous oblong entire and almost veinless leaves, and large bractless flowers in terminal clusters of three each or solitary in the axils. S. apetala, a tree of 40 feet, growing in Indian mangrove-swamps flooded by the tide, has the name of kambala (which see). S. acida, with a height of 15 feet, grows in large masses in similar situations ranging further east: its leaves are the food of a silkworm, and its acid and slightly bitter fruit is used as a condiment.

sonnet (son'et), n. [Early mod. E. also sonette; = D. sonnet, < F. sonnet, OF. sonet, a song, = Sp. Pg. soneto = It. sonetto, < Pr. sonet, a song (> G. Sw. sonett = Dan. sonet, a sonnet, canzonet), dim. of son, sound, tune, song, < L. sonus, a sound: see sound[5].] 1. A song; a ballad; a short poem.

I have a sonnet that will serve the turn.
Shak., T. G. of V., iii. 2. 93.

Teach me some melodious sonnet,
Sung by flaming tongues above.
R. Robinson, Come, Thou Fount of Every Blessing.

Specifically—2. A short poem in fixed form, limited to fourteen lines with a preseribed disposition of rimes. The form is of Italian origin. A sonnet is generally written in decasyllabic or five-foot measure; but it may be written in octosyllabics. It consists of two divisions or groups of lines—(1) a major group of eight lines or two quatrains, and (2) a minor group of six lines or two tercets. The quatrains are arranged thus: a, b, b, a; a, b, b, a; the tercets, either c, d, c, d, c, d, or c, d, e, c, d, e. In modern French examples the order of the tercets is generally c, c, d, e, d, e. There are various deviations from the sonnet as thus described; but by purists the above is regarded as the orthodox form, established by long practice and prescription, all others being ranked simply as quatorzains, or what Lamb called fourteeners. With regard to the material of the poem, it is generally considered that it should be the expression of a single thought, idea, or sentiment.

I can beste allowe to eall those Sonnets whiche are of foure tene lynes, euery line conteyning tenne syllables.
Gascoigne, Notes on Eng. Verse (ed. Arber), § 14.

sonnet (son'et), v. [< sonnet, n.] I. trans. 1. To celebrate in sonnets. [Rare.]

Daniel hath divinely sonnetted the matchless beauty of Delia. Francis Meres, in Arber's Eng. Garner, II. 96.

2. To cover or fill with sonnets. [Rare.]

Hee will be an Inamorato Poeta, and sonnet a whole quire of paper in praise of Ladie Manibetter, his yeolowfac'd mistres. Nashe, Pierce Penilesse, p. 17.

II. intrans. To compose sonnets.

Nor list I sonnet of my mistress' face,
To paint some Blowesse with a borrow'd grace.
Bp. Hall, Satires, I. i. 5.

(a) The use or application of sophisms; the process of investing with specious fallacies; the art of sophistry.

Skill in special pleading and ingenuity in sophistication.
Mrs. Cowden Clarke.

(b) The process of perverting or misleading by sophistry; hence, loosely, any perversion or wresting from the proper course; a leading or going astray.

From both kinds of practical perplexity again are to be distinguished those self-sophistications which arise from a desire to find excuses for gratifying unworthy inclinations.
T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 314.

(c) Adulteration; debasement by means of a foreign admixture.

A subtile discovery of outlandish merchants fraud, and of the sophistication of their wares.
Hakluyt's Voyages, To the Reader.

2. A sophism; a quibble; a specious fallacy.

Tyndalles tryflinge sophisticacions, whyche he woulde shoulde seeme so solempne subtile insolubles, . . . ye shall se proued very frantique folyes.
Sir T. More, Works (ed. 1557), I. 355.

3. That which is adulterated or not genuine; the product of adulteration.—4. A means of adulteration; any substance mixed with another for the purpose of adulteration.

The chief sophistications of ginger powder are sago-meal, ground rice, and turmeric. Encyc. Brit., I. 172.

sophisticator (sō-fis'ti-kā-tor), n. [< sophisticate + *-or*1.] One who sophisticates, in any sense of the word; especially, one who adulterates.

I cordially commend that the sophisticators of wine may suffer punishment above any ordinary thief.
T. Whitaker, Blood of the Grape (1654), p. 107.

sophisticism (sō-fis'ti-sizm), n. [< sophistic + -ism.] The philosophy or methods of the sophists.

sophistress (sof'is-tres), n. [< sophister + -ess.] A female sophist. [Rare.]

Mar. Shall I haue leaue (as thou but late with me) That I may play the Sophister with thee?
Pam. The Sophistresse.
Heywood, Dialogues (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 115).

You seem to be a Sophistress, you argue so smartly.
N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, I. 379.

sophistry (sof'is-tri), n.; pl. sophistries (-triz). [< ME. sophistrye, sophistric, sofystry (= G. sophisterei = Sw. Dan. sofisteri), < OF. sophisterie = Sp. The President may give Leave for the Sophimores to take out some particular Books.
Laws Yale Coll. (1774), p. 23 (Hall's College Words).

II. a. Pertaining to a sophomore, or to the second year of the college course; characteristic of sophomores: as, sophomore studies; sophomore rhetoric. [U. S.]

sophomoric (sof-ō-mor'ik), a. [< sophomore + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to a sophomore or a sophomore class. [U. S.]

Better to face the prowling panther's path
Than meet the storm of Sophomoric wrath.
Harvardiana, IV. 22 (Hall's College Words).

2. Characteristic of the traditional sophomore; bombastic; inflated; conceited; emphatically ignorant; immature and over-confident. [U. S.]

He [Davis] writes that he "never expected a Confederate army to surrender while it was able either to fight or to retreat"; but, sustained only by the sophomoric eloquence of Mr. Benjamin, he had no alternative.
The Century, XXXIX. 563.

They sat one day drawn thus close together, sipping and theorizing, speculating upon the nature of things in an easy, bold, sophomoric way.
G. W. Cable, Old Creole Days, p. 13.

sophomorical (sof-ō-mor'i-kal), a. [< sophomoric + -al.] Same as sophomoric. [U. S.]

Some verbose Fourth of July oration, or some sophomorical newspaper declamation. H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 435.

Sophora (sō-fō'rą), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < Ar. sofāra, a yellow plant (applied to one faded), < asfar, yellow: see saffron.] A genus of leguminous plants, of the suborder Papilionaceæ, type of the tribe Sophoreæ. It is characterized by flowers with a broadly obovate or orbicular banner-petal and oblong wings and keel, grouped in terminal racemes or panicles, and followed by thick or roundish or four-winged pods which are constricted into a succession of necklace-like joints (see cut under moniliform), and are usually indehiscent. There are about 30 species, natives of warm regions of both hemispheres. They are trees and shrubs, rarely perennial herbs, and bear odd-pinnate leaves, usually with very numerous small leaflets, but sometimes only a few, and then large and rigid. The flowers are white, yellow, or violet, and highly ornamental. Three species occur within the United States: S. secundiflora, the coral-bean of Texas (see frijolito); S. affinis, a small tree of Arkansas and Texas, with hard, heavy, coarse-grained, yellow and finally red wood, and resinous pods, from which a domestic ink is made; and S. tomentosa, a shrub of the Florida coast, with showy yellow flowers, also widely distributed along tropical shores of America, Africa, and Australia, and abundant on Fiji Island seabeaches, where it is known as kau-ni-alewa, or women's-tree. S. tetraptera of New Zealand is there known as laburnum or kowhai (for its variety Macnabiana, see pelu). S. Japonica is the Chinese or Japanese pagoda-tree or yen-ju, a very handsome quick-growing tree reaching 60 feet in height, with dark-green younger branches and deep blue-green leaves, sometimes cultivated, especially for its large panicles of small whitish autumnal flowers. Its hard compact wood is valued for turners' work; all parts are purgative; the austere pulp of the pods dyes yellow; and the flowers (called in Chinese wai-fa) furnish a yellow dye greatly valued in China. For this the tree is cultivated in several provinces, from which the dried flowers are exported in small sacks and used to dye blue cloth green, and to dye yellow the silk garments of the mandarins and the rush-mats which form the Chinese sails, beds, bags, and floor-matting.

Sophoreæ (sō-fō′rē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Sprengel, 1802), ⟨ Sophora + -eæ.] A tribe of leguminous plants, characterized by a commonly arboreous or high-climbing habit, pinnate leaves of five or numerous leaflets or of a single large leaflet, and flowers with ten free stamens. It contains about 34 genera, of which Sophora is the type, natives chiefly of the tropics, and largely of the southern hemisphere in America and Africa. For other important genera, see Myroxylon and Cladrastis. The latter is the chief genus represented in the United States; another, Camoensia, a lofty-climbing African shrub with handsome and gigantic flowers, is an exception in its trifoliate leaves. See cut under yellow-wood.

sophrosyne (sō-fros′i-nō), n. [⟨ Gr. σωφροσύνη, discretion, temperance, ⟨ σώφρων, earlier σαόφρων, of sound mind, temperate, ⟨ σῶς, orig. σαός*, sound, whole, safe, + φρήν, mind.] The quality of wise moderation; sound-mindedness; discreet good sense: referring especially to Greek art and philosophy.

He is much offended that you do stickle and keep on foot such questions, which may be better sopited and silenced than maintained and drawn into sidings and partakings. Wood, Athenæ Oxon., II. 332.

What could a woman desire in a match, more than the sopiting of a very dangerous claim, and the alliance of a son-in-law, noble, brave, well-gifted, and highly connected? Scott, Bride of Lammermoor, xviii.

sopition† (sō-pish′ọn), n. [⟨ sopite + -ion.] The act of sopiting, or putting to sleep; also, the state of being put to sleep; deep slumber; dormancy; lethargy.

As for dementation, sopition of reason, and the diviner particle, from drink, though American religion approve, and Pagan piety of old hath practised it, . . . Christian morality and the doctrine of Christ will not allow it. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 23.

sopor (sō′pọr), n. [= F. sopor, sopeur = Sp. Pg. sopor = It. sopore, ⟨ L. sopor, deep sleep, orig. svapor*, akin to somnus, sopnus*, svapnus*, sleep, = Gr. ὕπνος, sleep: see somnolent, sweven.] A deep, unnatural sleep; lethargy; stupor.

To awaken the Christian world out of this deep sopor or lethargy. Dr. H. More, Mystery of Iniquity, ii., Pref. (Encyc. Dict.)

Encyc. Brit., XX. 195.

Sorbonne (sôr-bon'), n. [F. Sorbonne, so named from Robert de Sorbon, its founder.] A celebrated house founded in the University of Paris about 1250 by Robert de Sorbon, chaplain and confessor of Louis IX. The college of the Sorbonne became one of the four constituent parts, and the predominant one, of the faculty of theology in the university. It exercised a high influence in ecclesiastical affairs and on the public mind, especially in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. It was suppressed during the revolution and deprived of its endowments. At the reconstruction of the university under Napoleon I. the building erected for it by Richelieu, and still called the Sorbonne, was given to the theological faculty in connection with the faculties of science and belles-lettres.

sorb-tree (sôrb'trē), n. Same as sorb[1], 1.

Sorbus (sôr'bus), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. sorbus, sorb: see sorb[1], serve[2], serviee[2].] A former genus of rosaceous trees, now included in Pyrus. See Pyrus, also sorb[1] and serviee-tree.

soredial (sō-rē'di-al), a. [< soredium + -al.] In lichenol., of the nature or appearance of a soredium.—Soredial branch, in lichenol., a branch produced by the development of a soredium into a new thallus while still on the mother thallus.

sorediate (sō-rē'di-āt), a. [< soredium + -ate[1].] In lichenol., bearing or producing soredia.

sorediferous (sor-ē-dif'e-rus), a. [< NL. soredium + L. ferre = E. bear[1].] In lichenol., sorediate; bearing soredia.

soredium (sō-rē'di-um), n.; pl. soredia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. σωρός, a heap, + -edium, for Gr. -ίδιον, a dim. suffix.] In lichenol., a single algal cell or a group of algal cells wrapped in more or less hyphal tissue, which serves the purpose of vegetative propagation: commonly in the plural. Such cells form little heaps or cushion-like masses breaking through the surface of the thallus, and when set free from the thallus are able to grow at once into new thalli. Usually one species of alga furnishes all the algal cells of a lichen; more rarely two, and then one prevails in abundance over the other. The same species of alga, however, may be found in consortism with different species of fungus, and taking part in the composition, therefore, of differently formed thalli—that is, different lichens. See Lichenes. Also sorede and brood-bud.

soree (sō'rē), n. A variant of sora. [U. S.]

Soree. Ral-bird.
T. Jefferson, Notes on Virginia (ed. 1788), p. 74.

Cf. Hyrax.] The typical genus of the family Soricidæ and subfamily Soricinæ, containing numerous small terrestrial shrews of both hemispheres. They have from 28 to 32 colored teeth, moderately long well-haired tail and ears, and feet not oared. The typical dentition of Sorex in the most restricted sense is 32 teeth, of which the upper incisors are 8, the (unspecialized canines and) upper premolars 6, the upper molars 6, and the total of the lower teeth 12 (as nearly constant throughout the family). S. vulgaris is the common shrew of Europe, and S. platyrrhinus is a common one in North America. See shrew[2].

sorgho (sôr'gō), n. Same as sorghum, 1. Also sorgo.

sorghum (sôr'gum), n. [Formerly also sorgum, also sometimes sorgo, sorgho, F. sorgho, < Sp. Pg. sorgo = It. sorgo, surgo; < NL. sorgum, sorghum, < ML. surgum, surcum, suricum, Indian millet, sorghum; prob. of E. Ind. origin.] 1. A plant of the former genus Sorghum, commonly the cultivated saccharine plant once known as Sorghum (or Holcus) saccharatum, lately considered a variety of S. vulgare, but now classified as Andropogon Sorghum, var. saccharatus. It is a cane-like grass, with the stature and habit of broom-corn, or of the taller varieties of Indian corn, but more slender than the latter, without ears, and of a glaucous hue. Sorghum is cultivated throughout Africa, in forms called imphee, chiefly for the sweet juice of the cane. In the United States it has been employed for many years to make syrup, for which purpose it is more or less grown in every State. It has also been the subject of much experiment in sugar-making, and according to Wiley is now practically available for this purpose. The name is also applied to the var. Halepense, and possibly to others of the same species. See def. 2. Also called Chinese sugar-cane.

2. [cap.] [NL. (Micheli, 1729).] A former genus of grasses, of the tribe Andropogoneæ, now included as a subgenus in Andropogon (Edouard Hackel, 1889). Like the rest of the whole genus, it has one-flowered spikelets disposed in pairs at the joints of a rachis, one of each pair pedicelled, one sessile. The sessile spikelet is in all the pairs alike; the flower is fertile, and in the pedicelled spikelets male, neutral, or abortive. The rachis is fragile, or in culture tenacious; its joints and the pedicels are filiform, and convex on the back or flat without furrow. The sessile spikelet and grain are somewhat compressed on the back, or in cultivation sometimes nearly globose. The species are most often tall and flat-leaved grasses, diffused through the tropics and here and there in the temperate zone—one, A. (Chrysopogon) nutans, the Indian grass or wood-grass, in the southern United States. The last is widely distributed in many forms; it is a nutritious grass, 6 feet high, with a graceful panicle, sometimes named wild oats. The one important species is A. Sorghum (Sorghum vulgare, etc.), a polymorphous much-cultivated species, of which some varieties have been regarded as distinct. Hackel divides it into the subspecies—(a) Halepense, including with other varieties the ornamental Aleppo grass and the Johnson or Means grass cultivated in the southern United States, and (b) sativus, which includes the broom-corn (var. technicus), the sorghum (var. saccharatus: see def. 1), the durra (vars. cernuus and Durra), the so-called Indian or African millet (covering perhaps the last and the var. vulgaris), and the guinea-corn or Kafir-corn, if it is different from the durra. The Johnson grass is of considerable utility as fodder, but is difficult to extirpate: also called Egyptian, Cuba, or Guinea grass, Australian or Morocco millet, etc., and sorghum. The durra has been somewhat cultivated in the United States, some forms of it being called Millo maize. See broom-corn, durra, and Indian millet (under millet).

Sorghum (Andropogon Sorghum).
1, wild form; 2, panicle of same; a, spikelets of cultivated form.

sorgo (sôr'gō), n. Same as sorghum.

sori, n. Plural of sorus.

Soricidæ (sō-ris'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sorex (Soric-) + -idæ.] A family of small insectivorous mammals, the shrews. They are of terrestrial, sometimes natatorial, habits, with a long and narrow skull without zygomatic arches or postorbital processes, annular tympanic bones, no symphysis pubis, the fore limbs not specially modified as in the moles, the tibia and fibula united, and the lower teeth 12 (in one genus 12 or 14). The lower incisors are long, proclivous, and usually notched; in the upper teeth the median incisors are large, and have a basal anag or cusp, appearing as if double (but see soricident); no canines are specialized, and the premolars are variable; the molars are large and multicuspidate. The total number of the teeth varies from twenty-six to thirty-two. The family is well marked, with little range of variation, though the species are so numerous. The shrews are all small animals, some being the smallest known mammals, and have the general appearance of mice, though with more pointed snout. The rather numerous (about 12) genera fall in two groups or subfamilies, Soricinæ and Crocidurinæ.

soricident (sō-ris'i-dent), a. [< L. sorex (soric-), a shrew, + den(t-)s = E. tooth.] Having or noting a dentition like that of shrews. This dentition is unique in some respects. It consists of the four kinds of teeth usual among diphyodont mammals, but no canines are specialized as such, and the median pair of incisors both above and below are remarkable in presenting two or more cusps, besides being of great size. These peculiarities, together with the speedy and complete obliteration of the maxillopremaxillary suture, have caused the median incisors alone to be so named, and have occasioned great uncertainty in the dental formulæ of the several genera of shrews. Determination of the position of the suture has shown, however, that several other pairs of teeth besides the specialized median upper pair are inserted in the premaxillary, and are therefore incisors; that the foremost pair of maxillary teeth (technically canines) are never specialized, and always small, and that these are followed by one or two pairs of premolars, constantly succeeded by three pairs of true molars. The constancy in number of the under teeth (twelve, with some anomalous exceptions) is also remarkable, and the total variation is only from twenty-six to thirty-two among all the genera. The eight upper incisors of several genera are a number unique among placental mammals; and the soricident dentition is, on the whole, in proportion to the size of the animals, the most formidable known among mammals, of greater relative power than that of any carnivore. See Soricidæ.

Soricident Teeth of Common Shrew (Sorex vulgaris), enlarged seven times.
i^1, large two-pronged anterior upper incisor; i^2, i^3, i^4, succeeding upper incisors, to mpx, line of obliterated maxillopremaxillary suture; c, first maxillary tooth, technically a canine, unspecialized and resembling the preceding incisor; pm^1, minute first premolar; pm^2, large sectorial premolar. In the lower jaw, 1, very large serrated anterior incisor; 2, 3, 4, following teeth to the one opposite pm^2; other teeth omitted.

Soricinæ (sor-i-sī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Sorex (Soric-) + -inæ.] The typical subfamily of Soricidæ, containing those shrews of both the Old and the New World which have the teeth brown or red: contrasted with Crocidurinæ. The genera usually admitted are Sorex, Neosorex, Notiosorex, Soriculus, Blarina, and Crossopus. See Sorex, and cuts under Blarina, shrew, and sondeli.

soricine (sor'i-sin), a. [< L. soricinus, of or belonging to a shrew, < sorex (soric-), shrew: see Sorex.] Resembling or related to a shrew or shrew-mouse; of or pertaining to the Soricinæ or Soricidæ; soricoid in a narrow sense.—Soricine bat, Glossophaga soricina, a small South American species of bat.

soricoid (sor'i-koid), a. and n. [< L. sorex (soric-), shrew, + -oid.] I. a. Soricine in the broadest sense; of or pertaining to the Soricoidea.

II. n. A member of the Soricoidea, as a shrew, shrew-mole, or mole.

Soricoidea (sor-i-koi'dē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Sorex (Soric-) + -oidea.] A superfamily of mammals of the order Insectivora, containing the two families Soricidæ and Talpidæ, the shrews and the moles.

soriferous (sō-rif'e-rus), a. [< Gr. σωρός, a heap, + φέρειν = E. bear[1].] In bot., bearing sori.

sorites (sō-rī'tēz), n.; pl. sorites. [NL., < L. sorites, < LGr. σωρείτης, σωρίτης, a logical sophism formed by an accumulation of arguments, lit. 'heaper,' < σωρεύειν, heap, < σωρός, a heap. In def. 2 first used by Laurentius Valla (died 1457).] 1. A kind of sophism invented by Chrysippus in the third century before Christ, by which a person is led by gradual steps from maintaining what is manifestly true to admitting what is manifestly false. For example: One grain of sand cannot make a heap; then, if one grain be added to a grain, the one added grain cannot make that a heap which was not a heap before; and so on, until it is shown that a million or more grains of sand cannot make a heap.

2. A chain-syllogism, or argument having a number of premises and one conclusion, the argumentation being capable of analysis into a number of syllogisms, the conclusion of each of which is a premise of the next. A sorites may be categorical or hypothetical, like a syllogism, and either variety may be progressive or regressive.—Progressive or Aristotelian sorites. See Aristotelian.—Regressive or Goclenian sorites. See Goclenian.

soritical (sō-rit'i-kal), a. [< LL. soriticus, < LGr. σωριτικός, < σωρείτης, σωρίτης, a sorites.] Pertaining to or resembling a sorites.

sormountet, v. An obsolete variant of surmount.

sorn (sôrn), v. i. [Said to be contr. < ME. sojórnen, sojourn: see sojourn. Cf. sorehon.] To obtrude one's self on another for bed and board; be an uninvited and unwelcome guest; sponge. [Scoteh.]

Lang-legged Hieland gillies that will neither work nor want, and maun gang thigging and sorning about on their acquaintance. Scott, Rob Roy, xxvi.

sornar (sôr'när), n. Same as sorner.

sorner (sôr'nėr), n. [< sorn + -er[1]; ult. a contraction of sojourner.] One who sorns; one who obtrudes himself on another for bed and board; in Scots law, one who takes lodging and food from others by force or menaces without paying for it. This offense was formerly so prevalent in Scotland that the severest penalties were enacted against it, and at one period it was punishable with death.

sorophore (sō'rō-fōr), n. [< NL. sorophorum*, neut. of sorophorus*: see sorophorous.] In bot., the mucilaginous cord or cushion which is emitted from the germinating sporocarp in Marsilea, and which bears the sori arranged in two rows. See cut under Marsilea.

sorophorous (sō-rof'ō-rus), a. [< Gr. σωρός, a heap, + -φορος, < φέρειν = E. bear[1].] Bearing sori.

sororal (sō-rō'ral), a. [< L. soror, sister (= E. sister), + -al.] Of or pertaining to a sister or sisters; sisterly.

The sororal relation. H. Mann.

sororially (sō-rō'ri-al-i), a. [< sororial* for sororal + -ly[2].] In a sisterly manner. [Rare.]

"This way then, my dear sister," cried Jane to the newcomer, and, taking her sororially by the hand, she led her forth from the oak parlour.
T. Hook, The Sutherlands. (Davies.)

sororicide[1] (sō-ror'i-sīd), n. [< L. sororicida, < soror, a sister, + -cida, < cædere, kill.] One who kills his sister. Blount, Glossographia.

sororicide[2] (sō-ror'i-sīd), n. [< LL. sororicidium, < L. soror, sister, + -cidium, < cædere, kill.] The murder of a sister. Bailey, 1727.

sororize (sō'ror-īz), v. i.; pret. and pp. sororized, ppr. sororizing. [< L. soror, sister, + -ize: simulating fraternize.] To associate as sisters; be in communion or sympathy as sisters. [Rare.]

The beautiful girls . . . are . . . sororizing with the rustic maidenhoods of their parishes.
Mortimer Collins, Thoughts in my Garden, II. 3. (Encyc. Dict.) sorory† (sō'ror-i), n. [< L. soror, sister: see sister.] A sisterhood. [Rare.]

While heauen did daigne the world should him inioy,
The ninefold Sorory themselves exiled,
Euen from their natiue home to art's annoy.
Tourneur, Transformed Metamorphosis, st. 68.

sorrel[1] (sor'el), n. [Early mod. E. also sorrell, sorel, sorell; < ME. sorel, < OF. sorel, F. surelle (ML. surella), sorrel, so named from its sour taste; with dim. -el, < sur, sour, sharp, < OHG. MHG. sūr, G. sauer, sour: see sour[1]. Cf. AS. sūre (= MLG. sūre = Icel. sūra = (with dim. suffix) D. zuring), sorrel, < sūr, sour: see sour[1].] 1. One of several species of the genus Rumex, smaller plants than the docks of the same genus, having the leaves typically halberd-shaped, more or less succulent, and impregnated with oxalic acid. The common sorrel of the Old World is R. Acetosa, which has been much cultivated for culinary use. R. scutatus, the French sorrel, is, however, preferred for the purpose, being more succulent and less acid. Sorrel is much grown on the European continent, especially in France. It is used in salads and soups, but is more commonly dressed as a spinach. The use of sorrel in America is slight but increasing. R. Acetosella, sometimes substituted for the foregoing, is the common sheep-sorrel. Both plants are refrigerant and diuretic antiscorbutics. See cut under Rumex.

2. A plant of the genus Oxalis, more properly called wood-sorrel (see cuts under Oxalis and obcordate): the name is also extended to other plants of different genera (see phrases).—Climbing sorrel, Begonia scandens, of tropical America, a somewhat shrubby herb climbing by rootlets. [West Indies.]—Field-sorrel. Same as sheep-sorrel.—Indian sorrel. Same as roselle.—Mountain-sorrel. See Oxyria.—Red sorrel. (a) Same as roselle. (b) The sheep-sorrel: probably from the red male inflorescence.—Salt of sorrel. See salt[1].—Switch-sorrel, a widely diffused tropical shrub, Dodonæa viscosa, of the Sapindaceæ. Its leaves have an acid and bitter taste.—Water-sorrel. Same as water-dock. (See also horse-sorrel.)

sorrel[2] (sor'el), a. and n. [Early mod. E. sorrell, sorell, sorel; < OF. sorel*, sorrel, surrel, dim. of sor, F. saur, saure, brown, reddish, brownish, sorrel: see sore[2].] I. a. Of a yellowish- or reddish-brown color.

Sothiac (sō'thi-ak), a. [= F. Sothiaque, < Gr. Σῶθις, an Egyptian name of Sirius.] Connected with Sirius, the dog-star.—Sothiac cycle or period. See cycle.

Sothic (sō'thik), a. [< Gr. Σῶθις, an Egyptian name of Sirius.] Of or pertaining to the dog-star, Sothis.—Sothic year, the fixed year of the Egyptians, determined by the heliacal rising of Sirius. Since the declination of this star is little altered by precession, and its rising took place about the summer solstice, the year would have averaged nearly the sidereal year, or 9 minutes more (instead of 11 minutes less, as the tropical year is) than 365¼ days. But it is said that in practice one day was intercalated every four years. The Sothic year seems to have been little used by the Egyptians, at least before the Ptolemies.

sotie†, n. [ME., also sotye, < OF. sotie, sottie, folly, foolishness, < sot, foolish: see sot[1].] Folly.

To seen a man from his estate

And lene that a man shall dooe.
Gower, Conf. Amant., vii.

sotil†, sotiltee†. Middle English forms of subtle, subtlety.

sotnia (sot'ni-ä), n. [< Russ. sotniya, a hundred.] A company or squadron in a Cossack regiment.

A party of Cossacks reached Pescherna from Lovatz; one sotnia turned northward and successfully attacked Toros. The other party turned south to Teteven.
G. B. McClellan, N. A. Rev., CXXVI. 150.

sotted†, a. [< ME. sotted; < sot[1] + -ed[2].] Besotted; befooled.

This sotted preest, who was gladder than he?
Chaucer, Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 330.

sottery† (sot'èr-i), n. [< sot[1] + -ery.] Folly.

Episcopacy, and so Presbytery, had indeed . . . suffered very much smut, soyle, darkness, and dishonour by the Tyrannies, Fedities, Luxuries, Sotteries, and Insolencies of some Bishops and other Churchmen under the Papal prevalency. Bp. Gauden, Tears of the Church, p. 12. (Davies.) sottie†, n. [OF.: cf. sotie.] A species of broad farce, satirical in its aim, popular in Paris in the fifteenth century and the early part of the sixteenth, from which the later French comedy derived some of its elements. The sotties were put down on account of their political effect.

sottise† (sot'is), n. [< F. sotise, sottise, < sot, foolish: see sot[1].] A piece of foolishness; a silly act or action; a stupid thing.

sottish (sot'ish), a. [< sot[1] + -ish[1].] Pertaining to a sot; having the character of a sot. (a) Dull; stupid; senseless; doltish; very foolish. (b) Dull with intemperance; given to tippling and drunkenness; pertaining to drunkenness: as, a man of sottish habits.

sottishly (sot'ish-li), adv. In a sottish manner; stupidly; senselessly; without reason. Glanville.

sottishness (sot'ish-nes), n. The state or character of being sottish. (a) Stupidity; dullness; foolishness.

The King [of Britain], both for his Wives sake and his own sottishness, consulting also with his Peers not unlike himself, readily yields. Milton, Hist. Eng., iii.

(b) Stupidity from intoxication; drunken habits generally.

No sober, temperate person can look with any complacency upon the drunkenness and sottishness of his neighbour. South.

sotto (sot'tō), prep. [It., < L. subter, under, beneath, < sub, under: see sub-.] Under; below: an Italian word occurring in a few phrases: as, sotto il soggetto, below the subject; sotto voce, under the voice, in an undertone, aside.

sot-weed† (sot'wēd), n. Tobacco. [Rare.]

I scarce had fill'd a pipe of sot-weed,
And by the candle made it hot-weed.
Hudibras Redivivus. (Nares.)

We had every one ramm'd a full charge of sot-weed into our infernal guns. Tom Brown, Works, II. 190.

sotylt, a. A Middle English form of subtle.

sou (sö), n. [F. sou, OF. sol, the name of a coin: see sol[2], sous, soldo.] An old Roman, Gallic, and French coin, originally of gold, then of silver, and finally of copper. Under Philip Augustus it was of silver, and of the value of twelve deniers. Under succeeding monarchs the value varied much; but twenty sous tournois were equivalent to one livre tournois, and twenty-four sous to one livre parisis. Under Obverse. Reverse.

Sou, 1793.—British Museum. (Size of the original.)

Louis XV. and Louis XVI. the sou was struck in copper, and had an intrinsic value of two deniers twelve grains, though retaining the conventional value of twelve deniers, and this coinage continued until the adoption of the existing decimal system in 1793. The present five-centime pieces, twenty of which make a franc, are still popularly called sous.—Sou marqué [F.], an old copper piece worth fifteen deniers (Littré); also, in the corrupted form sou marquee, said to be applied in the southern United States to a sou bearing some distinguishing mark, as a sou of 1767 counterstamped RF, or one marked in some way as counterfeit or spurious.

souari (sou-ä'ri), n. [Guiana.] A tree, Caryocar nuciferum (and also one or two other species of the genus), yielding nuts and a wood distinguished by the same name. Also saouari, souarri, and suwarrow.

souari-nut (sou-ä'ri-nut), n. See butternut, 2, and Caryocar. Also suwarrow-nut.

soubah, n. See subah.

soul[1] (sōl), n. [< ME. soule, sowle, saule, sawle, saull, < AS. sāwel, sāwol, sāwul, sāul, sāule, life, spirit, soul, = OS. sēola, sēole, sīole, sēle = OFries. siele, sēle = MD. siele, D. ziel = MLG. sēle, LG. sele, sal = OHG. sēla, sēula, MHG. sēle, G. seele = Icel. sāla, lator sāl = Sw. själ = Dan. sjæl = Goth. saiwala, soul (tr. Gr. ψυχή, etc.); origin unknown. The word has been compared with Gr. αἰόλος, quick-moving, changeful, and with sea (see sea[1]); also with L. sæculum, age (life, vitality ?) (see secle, seecular).] 1. A substantial entity believed to be that in each person which lives, feels, thinks, and wills. Animals also, and even plants, have been thought to have souls. Primitive peoples identify the soul with the breath, or something contained in the blood. Separated from the body, it is supposed to have some imperfect existence, and to retain the form of the body as a ghost. The verses of Davies (see below) enumerate most of the ancient Greek opinions. The first is that of Anaximander and of Diogenes of Apollonia; the second is that of Heraclitus; the third is that of Empedocles; the fourth is that attributed to Empedocles by Aristotle; the fifth is that of Dicæarchus and other Pythagoreans, as Simmias in the "Phædo"; the sixth is attributed wrongly to Galen; the seventh is that of Democritus and the atomists; the eighth is attributed by some authorities to the Pythagoreans; and the ninth is that of the Stoics. Aristotle makes the soul little more than a faculty or attribute of the body, and he compares it to the "axness" of an ax. The scholastics combined this idea with that of the separability and immortality of the soul, thus forming a highly metaphysical doctrine. Descartes originated distinct metaphysical dualism, which holds that spirit and matter are two radically different kinds of substance—the former characterized by consciousness, the latter by extension. Most modern philosophers hold to monism in some form, which recognizes only one kind of substance. That the soul is immortal is a very ancient and widely diffused opinion; it is also commonly believed that the soul has no parts. A soul separated from the body is commonly called a spirit, not a soul. In biblical and theological usage 'soul' (nephesh, psyche, also rendered 'life') is sometimes used for the non-corporeal nature of man in general, and sometimes, in distinction from spirit, for the lower part of this non-corporeal nature, standing in direct communication with the body, and regarded as the seat of the emotions, rarely of will or spirit. Some theologians minimize the distinction between soul and spirit, making them mere aspects or relations of the same substance, while others have made them distinct substances or distinct entities.

> For of the soule the bodie forme doth take;
> For soule is forme, and doth the bodie make.
> Spenser, Hymn in Honour of Beauty, l. 132.
> I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. 1 Thes. v. 23.

> They [corporations] cannot commit treason, nor be outlawed, nor excommunicate, for they have no souls.
> Case of Sutton's Hospital, 10 Coke's Rep., p. 32, b.

Although the human soul is united to the whole body, it has, nevertheless, its principal seat in the brain, where alone it not only understands and imagines, but also perceives. Descartes, Prin. of Philos. (tr. by Veitch), iv. § 189.

Our idea of soul, as an immaterial spirit, is of a substance that thinks and has a power of exciting motion in body by writing or thought.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxiii. § 22.

> With chemic art exalts the mineral powers,
> And draws the aromatic souls of flowers.
> Pope, Windsor Forest, i. 244.

It seems probable that the soul will remain in a state of inactivity, though perhaps not of insensibility, from death to the resurrection.
Hartley, Observations on Man, II. iv. § 3, prop. 90.

2. The moral and emotional part of man's nature; the seat of the sentiments or feelings: in distinction from intellect.

> Hear my soul speak:
> The very instant that I saw you, did
> My heart fly to your service.
> Shak., Tempest, iii. 1. 63.
>
> These vain joys, in which their wills consume
> Such powers of wit and soul as are of force
> To raise their beings to eternity.

> He had put domestic factions under his feet; he was the soul of a mighty coalition. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

4. Fervor; fire; grandeur of mind, or other noble manifestation of the heart or moral nature.

> I have been woo'd by many with no less > Soul of affection.
> Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, iv. 4.
>
> Money gives soul to action. Ford, Perkin Warbeck, iii. 1.
>
> There is some soul of goodness in things evil.
> Shak., Hen. V., iv. 1. 4.

5. A spiritual being; a disembodied spirit; a shade.

> Then of his wretched friend
> The Soul appear'd; at ev'ry part the form did comprehend
> His likeness; his fair eyes, his voice, his stature, ev'ry weed
> His person wore, it fantasied. Chapman, Iliad, xxiii. 1. 58.
>
> O sacred essence, other form,
> O solemn ghost, O crowned soul!
> Tennyson, In Memoriam, lxxxv.

6. A human being; a person.

> All the souls of the house of Jacob, which came into Egypt, were threescore and ten. Gen. xlvi. 27.
>
> My lord, this is a poor mad soul; . . . and the truth is, poverty hath distracted her. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ii. 1. 113.
>
> Humph. Where had you this Intelligence?
> Tom. From a foolish fond Soul that can keep nothing from me. Steele, Conscious Lovers, i. 1.

All Souls' day, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., the 2d of November, a day kept in commemoration of all the faithful departed, for the eternal repose of their souls, to which end the mass and offices of the day are directed. It is the day following the feast of All Saints.—Apparitional soul. See apparitional.—Commendation of the soul. See commendation, 5.—Cure of souls. See cure.—Descent of souls. See descent.—Seat of the soul, the part of the body (according to some speculators a mathematical point) in immediate dynamic connection with the soul. As long as the soul was supposed to be a material thing (which was the usual ancient opinion), it was naturally believed to have a distinct place. Later the knowledge of the functions of the nervous system, and their centralization in the brain, showed that the soul was more intimately connected with that than with other parts of the body; and it was vaguely supposed that the unity of consciousness would in some measure be explained by the hypothesis of a special seat of the soul in the brain. The commonest primitive notion was that the soul was resident in the blood or in the heart. Either the whole soul or its parts were also located in the bowels, bones, liver, gall, kidneys, and other organs. The doctrine that the soul is in the brain seems to have originated in Egypt, and found many partial adherents in antiquity, but was not generally accepted before modern times. The Neoplatonists held that the soul is wholly in the whole body and wholly in every part. Descartes placed the soul in the pineal gland, and other physiologists of the seventeenth century located it in different organs connected with the brain. Leibnitz introduced the theory that it resides at a mathematical point, which has found eminent supporters, some of whom regard this point as movable. Others hold that any conception of consciousness which forces its adherents to such a conclusion ought to be considered as reduced to an absurdity. Recent observations concerning multiple consciousness strengthen indications previously known that the unity of consciousness is somewhat illusory; and the anatomy of the brain does not support the notion of an absolute centralization of the power of forming ideas.—Sentient soul, the soul as affected by the senses, or as possessing sentience.—Syn. 1 and 2. Intellect, Spirit, etc. See mind[1].—4. Ardor, force.

soul[1]† (sōl), v. t. [< ME. sowlen; < soul[1], n.] To endue with a soul.

soulfully (sōl'fûl-i), adv. In a soulful or feeling manner.

soulfulness (sōl'fûl-nes), n. The quality or state of being soulful; feeling. Andover Rev., VII. 37.

soulili, n. [Javanese.] One of the sacred monkeys of Java, Semnopithecus mitratus, with a black peaked bonnet suggesting a miter.

soulish (sō'lish), a. [< soul[1] + -ish[1].] Of or pertaining to the soul. Byrom. [Rare.]

The . . . psychical (or soulish) man.
J. F. Clarke, Orthodoxy, its Truths and Errors, p. 181.

soul-killing (sōl'kil″ing), a. Destroying the soul; ruining the spiritual nature. Shak., C. of E., i. 2. 100.

soulless (sōl'les), a. [< ME. soulles*, < AS. sāwlleas, sāwolleás, soulless, lifeless, irrational, < sāwol, soul, life, + -leás, E. -less.] 1. Having no life or soul; dead.

Their holiness is the very outward work itself, being a brainless head and soulless body.
Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion (ed. 1605), X. 4. (Latham.)

2. Having no soul or spirit.—3. Having or expressing no thought or emotion; expressionless.

Having lain long with blank and soulless eyes,
He sat up suddenly. Browning, Paracelsus, iii.

4. Without greatness or nobleness of mind; mean; spiritless; base.

Slave, soulless villain, dog!
O rarely base! Shak., A. and C., v. 2. 157.

soullessness (sōl'les-nes), n. The state of being without soul, in any sense of that word.

A certain soullessness and absence of ennobling ideals in the national character. The Academy, No. 876, p. 109.

soul-mass† (sōl'màs), n. A mass for the dead.

soul-massing† (sōl'màs″ing), n. The saying of masses for the dead.

So doth it cast down all their soul-massing and foolish foundations for such as be dead and past the ministry of God's word.
J. Bradford, Works (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 278.

soul-paper† (sōl'pā″pėr), n. A paper or parchment bearing an inscription soliciting prayers for the soul of some departed person or persons. Soul-papers were given away with soul-cakes on All Souls' day.

soul-penny† (sōl'pen″i), n. An offering toward the expense of saying masses for the souls of the departed.

The Dean shall have, for collecting the soul-pennies from the bretheren, on the first day, ij. d. out of the goods of the gild. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 181.

soul-scot† (sōl'skot), n. [Prop. soul-scat, repr. AS. sāwel-sceat, sāwl-sceat, money paid at the open grave for the repose of the soul, < sāwel, soul, + sceat, money: see soul[1] and scat[1], and cf. scot[2], shot[2].] In old eccles. law, a funeral payment, formerly made at the grave, usually to the parish priest in whose church service for the departed had been said; a mortuary. Also soul-shot.

On each side of this bier kneeled three priests, who told their beads and muttered their prayers with the greatest signs of external devotion. For this service a splendid soul-scat was paid to the convent of Saint Edmund's by the mother of the deceased.
Scott, Ivanhoe, xlii.

Those among the dead man's friends and kinsfolks who wished had come and brought the soul-shot, as their gift at the offertory of that holy sacrifice.
Rock, Church of our Fathers, ii. 306.

soul-shot†(sōl'shot), n. See soul-scot.

soul-sick (sōl'sik), a. Diseased or distressed in mind or soul; morally diseased. [Rare.]

I am soul-sick,
And wither with the fear of one condemn'd,
Till I have got your pardon.
Beau. and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, iv. 1.

soul-silver†, n. [< soul[2] + silver.] The whole or a part of the wages of a retainer or servant, originally paid in food, but afterward commuted into a money payment. Halliwell.

soul-sleeper (sōl'slē″pėr), n. Same as psychopannychist.

soul-stuff (sōl'stuf), n. The hypothetical substance of the soul; psychoplasm. See mind-stuff.

soul-vexed (sōl'vekst), a. Disturbed or distressed in spirit. Shak., W. T., v. I. 59.

soum, sowm (soum), n. [A var. of sum[2], amount, proportion: see sum[2].] The proportion of cattle or sheep suitable to any pasture, or vice versa: as, a soum of sheep, as many sheep as a certain amount of pasturage will support; a soum of grass or land, as much as will pasture one cow or five sheep. [Scotch.]

soum, sowm (soum), v. i. [< soum, sowm, n.] To calculate and determine what number of cattle or sheep a certain piece of land will support. [Scotch.]—Soum and roum, to pasture [in summer] and fodder [in winter]. Jamieson.—Souming and rouming, in Scots law, the action whereby the number of cattle to be brought upon a common by the persons respectively having a servitude of pasturage may be ascertained. The criterion is the number of cattle which each of the dominant proprietors is able to fodder during winter. Strictly speaking, to soum a common is to ascertain the several soums it may hold, and to roum it is to portion it out among the dominant proprietors.

soun†, v. An obsolete variant of swoon.

soun[2]†, n. and v. An original spelling of sound[5].

sound[1] (sound), a. and n. [< ME. sound, sond, sund, isund, < AS. gesund (= OS. gesund = OFries. sund, sond = MD. ghesond, D. gezond = MLG. gesunt, LG. gesund, sund = OHG. gisunt, MHG. gesunt, G. gesund = Sw. Dan. sund), sound; < ge-, a collective and generalizing prefix (see i-), + sund*, of uncertain origin, perhaps akin to L. sanus, whole, sound: see sane[1].] I. a. 1. Healthy; not diseased; having all the organs and faculties complete and in perfect action: as, a sound mind; a sound body.

Ef horn child is hol and sund,
And Athulf bithute [without] wund.
King Horn (E. E. T. S.), p. 38.

Thaugh he falle, he falleth nat bote as ho fulle in a bote,
That ay is saf and sounde that sitteth with-ynne the borde.
Piers Plowman (C), xi. 40.

Universal distrust is so unnatural, indeed, that it never prevails in a sound mind. Channing, Perfect Life, p. 101.

2. Whole; uninjured; unhurt; unmutilated; not lacerated or bruised: as, a sound limb.

Thou dost breathe;
Hast heavy substance; bleed'st not; speak'st; art sound.
Shak., Lear, iv. 6. 52.

3. Free from special defect, decay, or injury; unimpaired; not deteriorated: as, a sound ship; sound fruit; a sound constitution.

Look that my staves be sound, and not too heavy.
Shak., Rich. III., v. 3. 66.

Her timbers yet are sound,
And she may float again.
Cowper, Loss of the Royal George.

A cellar of sound liquor, a ready wit, and a pretty daughter. Scott, Kenilworth, i.

4. Morally healthy; honest; honorable; virtuous; blameless.

In the way of loyalty and truth
Toward the king, my ever royal master, Dare mate a sounder man than Surrey can be.
Shak., Hen. VIII., iii. 2. 274.

5. Without defect or flaw in logic; founded in truth; firm; strong; valid; that cannot be refuted or overthrown: as, a sound argument.

About him were a press of gaping faces,
Which seem'd to swallow up his sound advice.
Shak., Lucrece, l. 1409.

Rules of life, sound as the Time could bear.
Wordsworth, Off Saint Bees' Heads.

6. Right; correct; well-founded; free from error; pure: as, sound doctrine.

It is out of doubt that the first state of things was best, that in the prime of Christian religion faith was soundest.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iv. 2.

Hold fast the form of sound words. 2 Tim. i. 13.

7. Reasoning accurately; logical; clear-minded; free from erroneous ideas; orthodox.

Who shall decide when doctors disagree,
And soundest casuists doubt, like you and me?
Pope, Moral Essays, iii. 2.

A kick that scarce would move a horse
May kill a sound divine.
Cowper, Yearly Distress.

8. Founded in right and law; legal; not defective in law: as, a sound title; sound justice.

They reserved theyr titles, tenures, and signiories whole and sound to themselves. Spenser, State of Ireland.

Here by equity we mean nothing but the sound interpretation of the law. Blackstone, Com., III. xxvii.

9. Unbroken and deep; undisturbed: said of sleep.

Let no man fear to die; we love to sleep all,
And death is but the sounder sleep.
Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant, iii. 6.

New waked from soundest sleep,
Soft on the flow'ry herb I found me laid
In balmy sweat. Milton, P. L., viii. 253.

10. Thorough; complete; hearty.

The men . . . give sound strokes with their clubs wherewith they fight. Abp. Abbot.

11. Of financial condition, solvent; strong; not undermined by loss or waste: as, that bank is one of our soundest institutions.—As sound as a roach. See roach[2].—Sound and disposing mind and memory, in the law of wills. See memory.—Sound mind. See insanity.—Sound on the goose. See goose.—Syn. 1. Hearty, hale, hardy, vigorous.—3. Entire, unbroken, undecayed.—5 and 7. Sane, rational, sensible.

II.† n. Safety. [Rare.]

Our goddis the gouerne, & soche grace lene
That thou the victorie wyn, thi worship to saue,
And to this Citie in sound thi seluyn may come.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 6135.

sound[1]†(sound), v. [< ME. sounden; < sound[1], a.]

I. trans. To heal; make sound.

Ferther wol I never founde
Non other help, my sores for to sounde.
Chaucer, Anelida and Arcite, l. 242.

II. intrans. To become sound; heal.

Thro girt with mony a wonnde,
That lykly ar never for to sounde.
Lydgate, Complaint of the Black Knight, l. 292.

sound[1] (sound), adv. [< sound[1], a.] Soundly; heartily; thoroughly; deeply: now used only of sleeping.

So sound he slept that nought mought him awake.
Spenser, F. Q., I. i. 42.

Till he tell the truth,
Let the supposed fairies pinch him sound.
Shak., M. W. of W., iv. 4. 61.

Every soul throughout the town being sound asleep before nine o'clock. Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 175.

sound[2] (sound), n. [< ME. sound, sund, < AS. sund, a sound, a strait of the sea (= MD. sond, sont, D. sond, sont, zond = MHG. G. sund = Icel. Sw. Dan. sund, a sound), also, in AS. and Icel., swimming; contracted from orig. swumd*, < swimman (pp. swummen), swim: see swim. Cf. sound[3].] A narrow passage of water not a stream, as a strait between the mainland and an isle, or a strait connecting two seas, or connecting a sea or lake with the ocean: as, Long Island Sound; the Sound (between Denmark and Sweden).

Behold, I come, sent from the Stygian sound,
As a dire vapour. B. Jonson, Catiline, i. 1.

And, with my skates fast-bound,
Skimmed the half-frozen Sound.
Longfellow, Skeleton in Armor.

Sound dues. See due[1].

sound[3] (sound), n. [< ME. sounde; cf. Icel. sundmagi, the sound of a fish, lit. 'swimming-maw': see sound[2] and maw[1].] In zoöl.: (a) The swimming-bladder or air-bladder of a fish. The sound is a hollow vesicular organ, originating from the digestive tract—in fact, a rudimentary lung, the actual homologue of the lungs of air-breathing vertebrates, though in fishes, as in other branchiates, respiration is effected by gills. (See air-bladder.) Some fishes' sounds are an esteemed article of food, as that of the cod, which when fried is something like an oyster so cooked; others are valuable as a source of isinglass.

> Sounde of a fyssche, cannon. Palsgrave. (Halliwell.)
> Of [fishes'] sounds we make isinglass.
> Goldsmith, Int. to Brookes's Nat. Hist., III.

(b) A cuttlefish.

sound[4] (sound), v. [Early mod. E. also sownde; < ME. sounden (= D. sonderen = G. sondiren = Sw. sondera = Dan. sondere), < OF. (and F.) sonder = Sp. Pg. sondar, sound; (a) perhaps < MD. sond, sund = AS. sund = Icel. Sw. Dan. sund, a strait, sound (cf. AS. sund-gyrd, a sounding-rod, sund-line, a sounding-line: see sound[2]); (b) otherwise perhaps < L. subundare*, submerge: see sub- and ound, undulate.] I. trans. 1. To measure the depth of; fathom; try or test, as the depth of water and the quality of the ground, by sinking a plummet or lead attached to a line on which is marked the number of fathoms. Machines of various kinds are also used to indicate the depth to which the lead has descended. A cavity in the lower end of the lead is partially filled with Apparatus used in Sounding.

A, B, C, Brooke's Deep-sea Sounding-apparatus: a, rod with horns b pivoted thereto; c, sounding-line; d, wires by which the lead e is attached to the horns, connected with a washer f under the lead; h, opening in lower end of rod, by which specimens of the bottom may be secured. When the rod strikes the bottom, the lead slides downward, bringing the horns into the position shown in B, and releasing the wires d and the lead; the rod only is then drawn up, leaving the lead at the bottom.

D, E, British Navy Sounding-apparatus: a, lead; b, counterpoised hooks which engage the loop at the top of the lead; d, wedge-shaped cup for specimens, attached by cord or wire to the pivot of the hooks; c, attachment for the sounding-line or -wire. When the cup d touches bottom, the hooks b drop into the position shown in E; the sinker or lead then drops over, releasing the cup, and this, with its specimen and the hooks, is drawn to the surface.

tallow, by means of which some part of the earth, sand, gravel, shells, etc., of the bottom adhere to it and are drawn up. Numerous devices are in use for testing the nature of the bottom, as a pair of large forceps or scoops carried down by a weight, which are closed when they

a and b, arms pivoted to c; d, lead, which is attached to a stem at the top of which is a crosspiece. When the arms are raised into the position shown in A, the crosspiece engages them and holds them in that position till the lead strikes the bottom; they are then released, and fall into the position shown in B. The cups (shown in the cuts), on closing, scoop up a specimen of the bottom.

strike the ground, and so inclose some of the sand, shells, etc., a cup at the bottom of a long leaden weight, which is closed by a leathern cover when full, etc. See the accompanying cuts of apparatus used in sounding. Brooke's apparatus is said to be the first by which soundings of over 2,000 fathoms were made and specimens of the bottom obtained.

> Go sound the ocean, and cast your nets;
> Happily you may catch her in the sea.
> Shak., Tit. And., iv. 3. 7.
>
> Two plummets dropt for one to sound the abyss.
> Tennyson, Princess, ii.

2. In surg., to examine by means of a sound or probe, especially the bladder, in order to ascertain whether a stone is present or not.

> By a precious oyle Doctor Russell at the first applyed to it when he sounded it with probe (ere night) his tormenting paine was . . . well asswaged.
> Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 179.

3. Figuratively, to try; examine; discover, or endeavor to discover, that which is concealed in the mind of; search out the intention, opinion, will, or wish of.

> It is better to sound a person with whom one deals, afar off, than to fall upon the point at first, except you mean to surprise him by some short question.
> Bacon, Negotiating (ed. 1887).
>
> I have sounded him already at a distance, and find all his answers exactly to our wish.
> Goldsmith, Good-natured Man, ii.

4. To ascertain the depth of (water) in a ship's hold by lowering a sounding-rod into the pump-well.—5. To make a sounding with, or carry down in sounding, as a whale the tow-line of a boat.—To sound a line, to sound all lines. See line[2].

II. intrans. 1. To use the line and lead in searching the depth of water.

> I sownde, as a schyppe man sowndeth in the see with his plommet to knowe the deppeth of the see. Je pilote.
> Palsgrave, p. 726.
>
> The shipmen . . . sounded, and found it twenty fathoms.
> Acts xxvii. 27, 28.

2. To penetrate to the bottom; reach the depth.

> For certes, lord, so sore hath she me wounded
> That stood in blake, with lokynge of hire eighen,
> That to myn hertis botme it is ysounded.
> Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 535.

3. To descend to the bottom; dive: said of fish and other marine animals. When a sperm-whale sounds, the fore parts are lifted a little out of water, a strong spout is given, the nose is dipped, the back and small are rounded up, the body bends on a cross-axis, the flukes are thrown up 20 or 30 feet, and the whale goes straight down head first, in less than its own length of water.

sound[4] (sound), n. [= D. G. Dan. sonde = Sw. sond, < F. sonde, a probe, a sounding-lead, = Sp. Pg. sonda, a sound; from the verb: see sound[4], v.] In surg., any elongated instrument, usually metallic, by which cavities of the body are sounded or explored; a probe; specifically, an instrument used for exploring or dilating the urethra, or for searching the bladder for stone.

sound[5] (sound), n. [< ME. sownde (with excrescent d), soun, sown, sowne, son, < OF. soun, son, sun, F. son = Pr. son, so = Sp. son = Pg. som = It. suono = Icel. sönn, a sound, < L. sonus, a sound; cf. Skt. svana, sound, √ svan, sound. Cf. sound[5], v., and see assonant, consonant, dissonant, resonant, person, parson, resound, sonata, sonnet, sonorous, sonant, unison, etc.] 1. The sensation produced through the ear, or organ of hearing; in the physical sense, either the vibrations of the sounding-body itself, or those of the air or other medium, which are caused by the sounding-body, and which immediately affect the ear. A musical sound, or tone, is produced by a continued and regular series of vibrations (or, in the physical sense, may be said to be these vibrations themselves); while a noise is caused either by a single impulse, as an electrical spark, or by a series of impulses following at irregular intervals. A sounding-body is a body which is in such a state of vibration as to produce a sound (see vibration). Thus, a tuning-fork, a bell, or a piano-string, if struck, will, in consequence of its elasticity, continue to vibrate for some time, producing, in the proper medium, a sound; similarly, the column of air in an organ-pipe becomes a sounding-body when a current of air is continually forced through the mouthpiece past the lip; again, an inelastic body, as a card, may become a sounding-body if it receives a series of blows at regular intervals and in sufficiently rapid succession, as from the teeth of a revolving cog-wheel. The vibrations of the sounding-body are conveyed to the ear by the intervening medium, which is usually the air, but may be any other gas, a liquid (as water), or an elastic solid. The presence of such a medium is essential, for sound is not propagated in a vacuum. The vibrations of the sounding-body, as a tuning-fork, produce in the medium a series of waves (see wave) of condensation and rarefaction, which are propagated in all directions with a velocity depending upon the nature of the medium and its temperature—for example, the velocity of sound in air is about 1,090 feet per second at 32° F. (0° C.), and increases slightly as the temperature rises; in other gases the velocity varies inversely as the square root of the density; it is consequently nearly four times as great in hydrogen. In liquids the velocity is greater than in air—for water, somewhat more than four times as great. In solids the velocity varies very widely, being relatively small in inelastic substances like wax and lead, and very great (two to three miles per second) in wood and steel. Sound-waves may differ (1) in their wave-length—that is, in the number of vibrations per second; (2) in the amplitude of the motion of the particles forming them; and (3) in their form, as to whether they are simple, and consist of a single series of pendulum-like vibrations, or are compound, and formed of several such series superimposed upon each other. Corresponding to these differences in the sound-waves, the sounds perceived by the ear differ in three ways: (1) They differ in pitch. If the sound-waves are long and the number of vibrations few per second, the pitch is said to be low and the sound is called grave; as the number of vibrations increases, the pitch is said to rise and the sound to be higher; if the number of vibrations is very great and the length of the waves correspondingly small, the sound becomes shrill and piercing. It is found that the vibrations must be as numerous as 24 per second in order that the ear may be able to unite them as a continuous sound. Similarly, if the vibrations exceed 30,000 to 40,000 per second, they cease to produce any sensation upon the ear. (2) Sounds differ in intensity or loudness. Primarily the intensity of the sound depends upon the amplitude of the vibrations; it diminishes with the square of the distance from the sounding-body; it also diminishes as the density of the air or other medium decreases, and is increased by the proximity of a sonorous body which can vibrate in unison with it. (3) Sounds differ in quality or timbre, that property by which we distinguish between the same tone as sounded upon two different musical instruments, as a piano and a violin. This difference is due to the fact that a note produced by a musical instrument is in general a compound note, consisting of the fundamental note, the pitch of which the ear perceives, and with it a number of higher notes of small intensity whose vibrations as compared with the fundamental note are usually as the numbers 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, etc. These upper notes, harmonics or over-tones (see harmonic), blend with the fundamental note, and upon their number and relative intensity, consequently, the resultant combined effect upon the ear, or the quality of the note, depends. Sound-waves may, like light-waves, be reflected from an opposing surface (see reflection, echo, resonance); they may be refracted, or suffer a change of direction, in passing from one medium to another of different density; they may suffer diffraction; and they may also suffer interference, giving rise to the pulsations of sounds called beats. See beat[1], 7.

2. A particular quality or character of tone, producing a certain effect on the hearer, or suggesting a particular cause; tone; note: as, a joyful sound; a sound of woe.

> There is a sound of abundance of rain. 1 Ki. xviii. 41.
>
> Doug. That 's the worst tidings that I hear of yet.
> Wor. Ay, by my faith, that bears a frosty sound.
> Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iv. 1. 128.
>
> The sound of a sea without wind is about them.
> Swinburne, Hesperia.

3. Vocal utterance.

> 'Tis not enough no harshness gives offence,
> The sound must seem an echo to the sense.
> Pope, Essay on Criticism, i. 365.

4. Hearing-distance; ear-shot.

> Sooner shall grass in Hyde-park Circus grow,
> And wits take lodgings in the sound of Bow.
> Pope, R. of the L., iv. 118.

5. Empty and unmeaning noise.

> A tale
> Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, > Signifying nothing. Shak., Macbeth, v. 5. 27.

6. Same as signal, 2.—Anacamptic sounds. See anacamptic.—Blood-sounds, in auscultation, anemic murmurs.—Bronchial sound, the normal bronchial breathing-sound.—Cardiac sounds, the heart-sounds.—Characteristic sound. See characteristic letter, under characteristic.—Cogged breath-sound. See breath-sound.—Friction sound. See friction-sound.—Refraction of sound. See refraction.—Respiratory sounds. See respiratory.—To read by sound, in teleg. See read[1].

=Syn. 1. Noise, Sound, Tone. Noise is that effect upon the ears which does not convey, and is not meant to convey, any meaning: as, the noise made by a falling chimney; street noises. Sound is a general word, covering noise and intelligible impressions upon the auditory nerves: as, the sound of cannon, of hoofs, of a trumpet, of prayer. Tone is sound regarded as having a definite place on the musical scale, or as modified by feeling or physical affections, or as being the distinctive quality of sound possessed by a person or thing permanently or temporarily: as, his tones were those of anger; a piano of peculiarly rich tone. For technical distinctions, see def. 1 above, noise, and tone.

sound[5] (sound), v. [< ME. sownden, sounen, sownen, suuen, < OF. suner, soner, F. sonner = Pr. Sp. sonar = Pg. soar = It. sonare (= Icel. sōna), < L. sonare, sound, < sonus, a sound: see sound[5], n.] I. intrans. 1. To produce vibrations affecting the ear; cause the sensation of sound; make a noise; produce a sound; also, to strike the organs of hearing with a particular effect; produce a specified audible effect: as, the wind sounds melancholy.

> Ther herde I pleyen on an harpe,
> That souned bothe wel and sharpe,
> Orpheus ful eraftely.
> Chaucer, House of Fame, i. 1202.
>
> O earth, that soundest hollow under me.
> Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

2. To cause something (as an instrument) to sound; make music.

> The singers sang, and the trumpeters sounded.
> 2 Chron. xxix. 28.

3. To seem or appear when uttered; appear on narration: as, a statement that sounds like a fiction.

> How oddly will it sound that I > Must ask my child forgiveness!
> Shak., Tempest, v. 1. 197.
>
> All this is mine but till I die;
> I can't but think 'twould sound more clever
> To me and to my heirs for ever.
> Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. vi. 11.
>
> Your father never dropped a syllable which should sound toward the asking me to assist him in his adversity.
> Godwin, Fleetwood, xix.

4. To be conveyed in sound; be spread or published.

> From you sounded out the word of the Lord.
> 1 Thes. i. 8.

5. To tend; incline. [Now rare.]

Alle hire wordes moore and lesse, Sownynge in vertu and in gentillesse.
Chaucer, Physician's Tale, l. 54.

Seyng any thyng sownyng to treson.
Paston Letters, I. 183.

All such thingis as sowne wyth or ayenst the common wele. Arnold's Chron., p. 88.

6†. To resound.

The shippes hereupon discharge their Ordinance, . . . insomuch that the tops of the hilles sounded therewith.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 245.

To sound in damages, in law, to have as its object the recovery of damages: said of an action brought, not for the recovery of a specific thing, as replevin or an action of debt, but for damages only, as for trespass, etc.

II. trans. 1. To cause to produce sound; set in audible vibration.

A baggepipe wel conde he blowe and sowne.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 565.

I have sounded the very base-string of humility.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., ii. 4. 6.

2. To utter audibly; pronounce; hence, to speak; express; repeat.

But now to yow rehersen al his speche,
Or al his woful wordes for to sowne.
Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 573.

Then I, as one that am the tongue of these,
To sound the purposes of all their hearts.
Shak., K. John, iv. 2. 48.

The Arab by his desert well
. . . hears his single camel's bell Sound welcome to his regal quarters.
Whittier, The Haschish.

3. To order or direct by a sound; give a signal for by a certain sound: as, to sound a retreat.

To sound a parley to his heartless foe.
Shak., Lucrece, l. 471.

4. To spread by sound or report; publish or proclaim; celebrate or honor by sounds.

Thou sun, of this great world both eye and soul,
Acknowledge him thy greater; sound his praise.
Milton, P. L., v. 171.

She lovea aloft to sound
The Man for more than Mortal Deeds renown'd.
Congreve, Pindaric Odes, ii.

5. To signify; import. [A Latinism.]

Hiae resons he spak ful solempnely, Sownynge alway thencrees of his wynnyng.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 276.

If you have ears that will be pierced — or eyes
That can be opened — a heart that may be touched —
Or any part that yet sounds man about you.
B. Jonson, Volpone, iii. 6.

The cause of divorce mentioned in the law is translated "some uncleanness," but in Hebrew it sounds "nakedness of aught, or any real nakedness." Milton, Divorce, i.

6. To examine by percussion, as a wall in order to discover hollow places or studding; specifically, in med., to examine by percussion and auscultation, in order to form a diagnosis by means of sounds heard: as, to sound the lungs.

sound[6] (sound). An obsolete or dialectal contracted form of swound, swoon.

soundable (soun'da-bl), a. [< sound[4] + -able.] Capable of being sounded.

soundboard (sound'bōrd), n. 1. In musical instruments, a thin resonant plate of wood so placed as to enhance the power and quality of the tones by sympathetic vibration. In the pianoforte it is placed just under or behind the strings; in the pipe-organ it forms the top of the wind-chest in which the pipes are inserted; in the violin, guitar, etc., it is the same as the belly — that is, the front of the body. Great care is exercised in the selection and treatment of the wood for soundboards, which is either pine or spruce-fir. Also sounding-board. See cut under harp.

2. Same as sounding-board, 1. See cut under abat-voix.—Pedal soundboard, See pedal.

sound-boarding (sound'bōr″ding), n. In carp., short boards which are disposed transversely between the joists, or fixed in a partition for holding the substance called pugging, intended to prevent sound from being transmitted from one part of a house to another.

sound-body, sound-box, sound-chest (sound'-bod″i, -boks, -chest), n. Same as resonance-box.

sound-bone (sound'bōn), n. [< sound[3] + bone.] The bone of a fish lying close to the sound or air-bladder. It is a part of the backbone, consisting of those vertebræ collectively which are ordinarily cut out in one piece in splitting the fish.

sound-bow (sound'bō), n. The thickened edge of a bell against which the clapper strikes. In stating the proportions of a bell, the thickness of the sound-bow is usually taken as a unit.

sound-deafness (sound'def″nes), n. Deafness to sound of every pitch or quality, as distinguished from pitch-deafness and timbre-deafness.

sounder[1]† (soun'dėr), n. [Early mod. E. also sownder, < ME. soundre, < AS. sunor, a herd.] 1. A herd of wild swine.

That men calleth a trip of a tame swyn is called of wylde swyn a soundre: that is to say, 3if ther be passyd v. or vj. togedras. MS. Bodl. 546. (Halliwell.)

Now to speke of the boore, the fyrste year he is A pygge of the sounder callyd, as haue I blys;
The secounde yere an hogge, and soo shall he be,
And an hoggestere whan he is of yeres thre;
And when he is foure yere, a boor shall he be,
From the sounder of the swyne thenne departyth he.
Book of St. Alban's (ed. 1496), sig. d., l.

2. A young wild boar: an erroneous use.

It had so happened that a sounder (i. e., in the language of the period, a boar of only two years old) had crossed the track of the proper object of the chase.
Scott, Quentin Durward, ix.

Such then were the pigs of Devon, not to be compared with the true wild descendant, . . . whereof many a sounder still grunted about Swinley down.
Kingsley, Westward Ho, viii.

sounder[2] (soun'dėr), n. [< sound[4] + -er[1].] A sounding-machine.—Flying sounder, an apparatus, devised by Thomson, for obtaining deep-sea soundings, at a moderate depth, without rounding to or reducing speed. With this sounding-machine a sounding was made at a depth of 130 fathoms while the steamer was moving at the rate of 16 knots an hour.

sounder[3] (soun'dėr), n. [< sound[5] + -er[1].] That which sounds; specifically, in teleg., a receiving instrument in the use of which the message is read by the sound produced by the armature of the electromagnet in playing back and forth between its stops.

sound-figures (sound'fig″ūrz), n. pl. Chladni's figures. See nodal lines, under nodal.

sound-hole (sound'hōl), n. In musical instruments of the viol and lute classes, an opening in the belly or soundboard, so shaped and placed as to increase its elasticity and thus its capacity for sympathetic vibration. In the modern violin and similar instruments there are two sound-holes, placed on each side of the bridge; they are usually called the f-holes, from their shape.

sounding[1] (soun'ding), n. [< ME. soundynge, sowndyng, sowninge; verbal n. of sound[4], v.] 1. The act or process of measuring the depth of anything; exploration, as with a plummet and line, or a sound.—2. The descent of a whale or of a fish to the bottom after being harpooned or hooked.—3. pl. The depth of water in rivers, harbors, along shores, and even in the open seas, which is ascertained in the operation of sounding. The term is also used to signify any place or part of the ocean where a deep sounding-line will reach the bottom; also, the kind of ground or bottom where the line reaches. Soundings on English and American charts are expressed in fathoms, except in some harbor-charts where they are in feet. See deep-sea.—In or on soundings, (a) So near the land that a deep-sea lead will reach the bottom. (b) In comparatively shoal water: said of a whale in the Arctic Ocean, Bering Sea, Sea of Okhotsk, or in bays, lagoons, etc., whose depths may be readily fathomed.—To get on or off soundings, to get into or beyond water where the bottom can be touched by sounding; figuratively, to enter into a subject or topic which one is or is not competent to discuss.—To strike soundings, to find bottom with the deep-sea lead.

sounding[2] (soun'ding), n. [< ME. soundyng; verbal n. of sound[5], v.] The act of producing a sound or a noise; also, a sound or a noise produced; specifically, in music, compare sound[5], v. i., 2.

Musicians have no gold for sounding.
Shak., R. and J., iv. 5. 143.

The Stage.
After the second sounding [of the music].
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, Ind.

sounding[2] (soun'ding), p. a. [Ppr. of sound[5], v.] 1. Causing or producing sound; sonorous; resounding; making a noise.

Ay me! whilst thee the shores and sounding seas
Wash far away. Milton, Lycidas, l. 154.

2. Having a magnificent or lofty sound; hence, bombastic: as, mere sounding phrases.

Keep to your subject close in all you say;
Nor for a sounding sentence ever stray.
Dryden and Soames, tr. of Boileau's Art of Poetry, i. 182.

sounding-board (soun'ding-bōrd), n. 1. A canopy over a pulpit, etc., to direct the sound of a speaker's voice toward the audience. See abat-voix. Also soundboard.

Since pulpits fail, and sounding-boards reflect Most part an empty, ineffectual sound.
Cowper, Task, iii. 21.

2. In building, a board used in the deafening of floors, partitions, etc. See sound-boarding.—3. Same as soundboard, 1.

sounding-bottle (soun'ding-bot″l), n. A vessel for raising water from a great depth for examination and analysis. It is generally made of wood, and has valves opening upward in the top and bottom. It is fixed on the sounding-line over the lead, so that the water passes through it as the line descends; but when it is drawn up the force of gravity closes the valves, thus retaining the contents. It often contains a thermometer for showing the temperature below the surface.

sounding-lead (soun'ding-led), n. The weight used at the end of a sounding-line.

sounding-line (soun'ding-līn), n. A line for trying the depth of water.

sounding-machine (soun'ding-ma-shēn″), n. A device for taking deep-sea soundings. See deep-sea.

sounding-post (soun'ding-pōst), n. Same as sound-post.

sounding-rod (soun'ding-rod), n. A graduated rod or piece of iron used to ascertain the depth of water in a ship's pump-well, and consequently in the hold.

soundisman†, n. A Middle English form of sandesman.

Then sent were there sone soundismen two
To Priam, the prise kyng, purpos to hold.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 8866.

soundless[1] (sound'les), a. [< sound[4] + -less.] Incapable of being sounded or fathomed; unfathomable.

He upon your soundless deep doth ride.
Shak., Sonnets, lxxx.

soundless[2] (sound'les), a. [< sound[5] + -less.] Having no sound; noiseless; silent; dumb.

Cas. For your words, they rob the Hybla bees,
And leave them honeyless. . . .
Bru. O yes, and soundless too;
For you have stol'n their buzzing, Antony.
Shak., J. C., v. 1. 36.

sound-line (sound'līn), n. The tow-line carried down by a whale when sounding.

soundly (sound'li), adv. [< sound[1] + -ly[2].] In a sound manner, in any sense of the word sound.

soundness (sound'nes), n. [< sound[1] + -ness.] The state of being sound, in any sense.=Syn. See sound[1], a.

sound-post (sound'pōst), n. In musical instruments of the viol class, a small cylindrical wooden prop or pillar which is inserted between the belly and the back, nearly under the treble foot of the bridge. Its purpose is to prevent the crushing of the belly by the tension of the strings, and to transmit the vibrations of the belly to the back. Its material, shape, and position are of great importance in determining the quality and power of the tone. It is sometimes called the instrument's soul or voice. Also sounding-post.

sound-proof (sound'prōf), a. Impervious to sound; preventing the entrance of sounds.

It [silicate of cotton] is of great efficiency as a stuffing for sound-proof walls and flooring. Ure, Dict., IV. 293.

sound-radiometer (sound'rā-di-om″e-tėr), n. An apparatus devised by Dvorak to show the mechanical effect of sound-waves. It consists of a light cross of wood pivoted with a glass cap upon a vertical needle, and carrying four pieces of card perforated with a number of holes, raised on one side and depressed on the other like those of a nutmeg-grater. The cross-vanes rotate rapidly when placed before the resonance-box of a loud-sounding tuning-fork.

sound-register (sound'rej″is-tėr), n. An apparatus for collecting and recording tones of the singing voice or of a musical instrument. It was invented in Paris in 1858.

sound-shadow (sound'shad″ō), n. The interception of a sound by some large object, as a building. It is analogous to a light-shadow, but is less distinct, since sound-waves have much greater length than light-waves.

For just as a high wall, a hill, or a railway-cutting often completely cuts off sounds by forming a sound-shadow.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXI. 364.

sound-wave (sound'wāv), n. A wave of condensation and rarefaction by which sound is propagated in an elastic medium, as the air. See sound[5] and wave.

sounet, n. and v. A Middle English form of sound[5].

soup[1] (soup), v. and n. An obsolete or dialectal form of sup.

soup[2] (söp), n. [= D. soep = MHG. G. suppe = Sw. soppa = Dan. suppe = Icel. sūpa, soup; < OF. (and F.) soupe, soup, broth, pottage, sop, = Pr. Sp. Pg. It. sopa, soup; < MD. soppe, sop, a sop, broth, D. sop, broth, = Icel. soppa = Sw. soppa, a sop: see sop. Soup[2] is a doublet of sop, derived through OF., while soup[1], n., is a native variant of sup.] 1. In cookery, originally, a liquor with something soaked in it, as a sop of bread; now, a broth; a liquid dish served usually before fish or meat at dinner. The basis of most soups is stock; to this are added meat, vegetables, vermicelli, herbs, wine, seasoning, or whatever is chosen: as, cream soup; tomato soup; turtle soup. See julienne, purée, soup-maigre.

Between each act the trembling salvers ring,
From soup to sweet-wine.
Pope, Moral Essays, iv. 162.

2. A kind of pienic in which a great pot of soup is the principal feature. Compare the like use of chowder. [West Virginia.]—Portable soup, a sort of cake formed of concentrated soup, freed from fat, and, by long-continued boiling, from all the putrescible parts.

soup[3]†, v. An obsolete form of soop, swoop.

soupçon (söp-sôn′), n. [F., a suspicion: see suspicion.] A suspicion; hence, a very small quantity; a taste: as, water with a soupçon of brandy.

(b) The rule or sway of a monarch; royal or imperial power.

Jovius Augustus . . . let the true nature of his power be seen, and, first among the Cæsars, arrayed himself with the outward pomp of sovereignty.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 138.

(c) Supremacy or dominion; hegemony: applied to the relation between a powerful state and other states or regions: as, Rome's sovereignty over the East; Great Britain holds the sovereignty of the seas. (d) The supreme, absolute, uncontrollable power by which any state is governed (Cooley); the political authority, whether vested in a single individual or in a number of individuals, to order and direct what is to be done by each individual in relation to the end and object of the state (Halleck). It is essential to the modern conception of sovereignty that it should be exclusive of any other human superior authority, should be wielded by a determinate person or organization of persons, and should be on the whole habitually obeyed by the bulk of the community. Thus, in the United States, sovereignty is vested in the body of adult male citizens. The claim that each State—that is, the adult male free citizens of each State—possessed a separate sovereignty was one of the elements of controversy involved in the civil war.

I state Austin's doctrine of Sovereignty in another way, more popularly, though without, I think, any substantial inaccuracy. It is as follows: There is, in every independent political community—that is, in every political community not in the habit of obedience to a superior above itself—some single person or some combination of persons which has the power of compelling the other members of the community to do exactly as it pleases. This single person or group—this individual or this collegiate Sovereign . . .—may be found in every independent political community as certainly as the centre of gravity in a mass of matter. If the community be violently or voluntarily divided into a number of separate fragments, then, as soon as each fragment has settled down (perhaps after an interval of anarchy) into a state of equilibrium, the Sovereign will exist and with proper care will be discoverable in each of the now independent portions. The Sovereignty over the North American Colonies of Great Britain had its seat in one place before they became the United States, in another place afterwards; but in both cases there was a discoverable Sovereign somewhere. This Sovereign, this person or combination of persons, universally occurring in all independent political communities, has in all such communities one characteristic common to all the shapes Sovereignty may take, the possession of irresistible force, not necessarily exerted, but capable of being exerted. . . . The Sovereign, if a single person, is or should be called a Monarch; if a small group, the name is an Oligarchy; if a group of considerable dimensions, an Aristocracy; if very large and numerous, a Democracy.

Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 349.

Much is said about the sovereignty of the States. . . . What is sovereignty in the political sense of the term? Would it be far wrong to define it "a political community without a political superior"? Tested by this, no one State, except Texas, ever was a sovereignty.
Lincoln, in Raymond, p. 146.

The chief attributes of sovereignty with which the states have parted are the coining of money, the carrying of mails, the imposing of tariff dues, the granting of patents and copyrights, the declaration of war, and the maintenance of a navy. J. Fiske, Amer. Pol. Ideas, p. 98.

(e) A state, community, or political unit possessing independent power.

The late colonies had but recently become compactly organized self-governing States, and were standing somewhat stiffly apart, a group of consequential sovereignties, jealous to maintain their blood-bought prerogatives, and quick to distrust any power set above them, or arrogating to itself the control of their restive wills.
W. Wilson, Cong. Gov., i.

(f†) Supremacy in excellence; supreme excellence.

Fie, fie, unreverend tongue! to call her bad
Whose sovereignty so oft thou hast preferr'd
With twenty thousand soul-confirming oaths.
Shak., T. G. of V., ii. 6. 15.

(g) Efficacy; especially, medicinal efficacy.

Compare vinea, also cat and cat-castle.—Old sow. See old.—To have, take, or get the right (or wrong) sow by the ear, to pitch upon the right (or wrong) person or thing; come to the right (or wrong) conclusion. [Low.]

He has the wrong sow by the ear, i' faith; and claps his dish at the wrong man's door.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, ii. 1.

You have a wrong sow by the ear.
S. Butler, Hudibras, II. iii. 580.

II. a. Female: applied to fish: as, a sow hake. See sow fish, under fish[1].

sow[3]†, v. An obsolete spelling of sew[1].

sowa (sō'ä), n. See soya.

sowans (sō'anz), n. pl. Same as sowens.

sowar (sō-är'), n. [Also suwar; < Hind. sawār, < Pers. sawār, a horseman.] A horse-soldier; especially, a native cavalry soldier in the British-Indian army, often in the sense of an orderly or mounted attendant or guard.

In the cavalry of the Madras army the horses are provided by Government, but in that of Bengal and Bombay the trooper, or sowar, as he is designated in India, finds himself in everything except his arms.
N. A. Rev., CXXVII. 145.

sowback (sou'bak), n. A low ridge of sand or gravel; a hogback or horseback; a kame; a drum or drumlin.

The long parallel ridges, or "sowbacks" and "drums," as they are termed, . . . invariably coincide in direction with the valleys or straths in which they lie.
J. Geikie, Great Ice Age, p. 17.

sowbane (sou'bān), n. The maple-leaved goosefoot, Chenopodium hybridum, regarded as fatal to swine. Also called hog's-bane.

sow-belly (sou'bel$^{\prime}$i), n. Salt pork; salt-horse; salt-junk: used by fishermen, whalers, sailors, and soldiers. [Low.]—Sow-belly hake. See hake[2].

sowbread (sou'bred), n. A plant of the genus Cyclamen, particularly C. Europæum. The species are low stemless herbs sending up leaves and scapes from corms which are sometimes very large, and, where native, are sought after by swine. The flowers are rose-colored, pink, or white, nodding, the divisions of the corolla reflexed, and are cultivated for ornament, the best-known species being C. Europæum, hardy in southern Europe and England, and the more tender and showy C. Persicum.

sow-bug (sou'bug), n. A hog-louse; a pill-bug; a sow; any terrestrial isopod of the family Oniscidæ, as Onisens asellus. Some sow-bugs can roll themselves up into a ball like a tiny armadillo. See sow[2], n., 2, and cut under Onisens.

sowcet, An obsolete form of sousel, souse[2].

sowdant†, n. An obsolete variant of sultan. Chaucer.

sowdanesse†, sowdannesse†, n. Obsolete variants of sultaness.

sow-drunk (sou'drungk), a. Drunk as a sow; beastly drunk. [Prov. Eng.]

Soft sow-droonk that tha doesn not touch thy 'at to the Squire. Tennyson, Northern Cobbler.

sowdwort†, n. An obsolete form of saltwort (Salsola Kali): also applied to the columbine, Aquilegia vulgaris.

sowel, n. Same as soul[2].

sowens (sō'enz), n. pl. [Also sowans, sowins; origin obscure; cf. sew[2].] 1. A nutritious article of food made from the farina remaining among the husks of oats, much used in Scotland and formerly in Northumberland. The husks (called in Scotland seeds or sids), after being separated from the oatmeal by the sieve, still retain a considerable portion of farinaceous matter. A quantity of the husks is steeped in water till the farinaceous matter is dissolved, and until the liquid has become sour. The whole is then put into a sieve, which allows the milky liquid to pass through into a barrel or other vessel, but retains the husks. The starchy matter gradually subsides to the bottom of the barrel. The sour liquor is then decanted off, fresh water is stirred into the deposit that is left, and the mixture, when boiled, forms sowens. In England it is more commonly called flummery. The singular form sowen is used attributively or in compounds: as, a sowen-tub.

These sowins, that is, flummery, being blended together, produce good yeast. Mortimer, Husbandry.

As if it were any matter . . . whether a ploughman had supplit on minched pies or sour sowens.
Scott, Old Mortality, vii.

2. A kind of paste employed by weavers for stiffening their yarn in working.

[Scotch and prov. Eng. in both senses.]

sower[1] (sō'ėr), n. [< ME. sower, sawere, < AS. sāwere, a sower, < sāwan, sow: see sow[1].] 1. One who sows or scatters seed.

Behold, a sower went forth to sow. Mat. xiii. 3.

2. That which sows seed; a sowing-machine.—3. One who scatters or spreads; a disseminator; a breeder; a promoter.

They are the sowers of suits, which make the court swell, and the country pine. Bacon.

Terming Paul . . . a sower of words, a very babbler or trifler. Hakewill.

sower[2]†, n. An obsolete spelling of sewer[1].

sower[3]†, a. An obsolete spelling of sour[1].

sow-fennel (sou'fen$^{\prime}$el), n. See fennel.

sow-gelder (sou'gel$^{\prime}$dėr), n. One who spays sows.

First, he that led the cavalcate
Wore a sow-gelder's flagellate [horn].
S. Butler, Hudibras, II. ii. 610.

sowiet (sou'i), n. Same as sow[2], 4.

They laid their sowies to the wall.
Auld Maitland (Child's Ballads, VI. 222).

sowing (sō'ing), n. [Verbal n. of sow[1], v.] 1. The act of one who sows or scatters seed.—2. That which is sowed.

You could not keep the birds out of the garden, try how you would. They had most of the sowings up.
The Century, XXXVI. 815.

sowing-machine (sō'ing-ma-shēn$^{\prime}$), n. In agri.: (a) A hand or horse-power seed-planting machine. (b) A broadcast sower. The hand-machines consist of a simple mechanism turned by a crank, which scatters the seed in a cloud in every direction. It is carried in one hand and operated by the other.

sowins (sō'inz), n. pl. See sowens.

sowker†, n. An obsolete form of sucker.

sowl†, sowle[1]†. Obsolete forms of soul[1], sole[6].

sowle[2], n. Same as soul[2].

sowm, n. and v. See soum.

sown[1] (sōn). A past participle of sow[1].

sown[2]†, sowne†, n. and v. Obsolete forms of sound[5].

sown[3]†, n. and v. An obsolete form of swoon.

sowpt, n. An obsolete form of soup[2].

sowse†. An obsolete spelling of souse[1], souse[2].

sowskin (sou'skin), n. See hogskin.

sowster†, n. Same as sewster. Halliwell.

sowtege†, n. See soutage.

sowter†, sowterly†. Obsolete forms of souter, souterly.

sowth[1]†, n. and a. An obsolete spelling of south.

sowth[2] (south), v. [Appar. a var. of souch, sough[1].] I. intrans. To whistle softly. [Scotch.]

II. trans. To try over, as a tune, with a low whistle. [Scotch.]

On braes when we please, then,
We'll sit an' sowth a tune; . . .
An' sing 't when we ha'e dune.
Burns, First Epistle to Davie.

sowther, v. Same as souther[2]. Halliwell.

sow-thistle (sou'this$^{\prime}$l), n. [< ME. sowthystell, < AS. sugethistel, < sugu, sow, + thistel, thistle. In ME. also called swines thistell.] A plant of the genus Sonchus, primarily S. oleraceus, a weed of waste places, probably native in Europe and central Asia, but now diffused nearly all over the world. It is a smooth herb with a milky juice, bearing runcinate-pinnatifid leaves and rather small yellow flower-heads. A similar plant, but with less divided spiny leaves, is S. asper. A much more showy species is S. arvensis, with larger and brighter heads. These are all naturalized in the United States, the last less abundantly. The name has been extended to species of the allied genus Lactuca.

Sow-thistle (Sonchus oleraceus).
1, upper part of the stem with the heads; 2, one of the basal leaves; a, a flower; b, the achene with the pappus.

soy (soi), n. [Also sooja; = F. soy, soui = G. Sw. Dan. soja (NL. soja, soya); < Jap. si-yan, Chinese shi-yu, soy.] 1. A kind of sauce prepared in the East from the soy-bean (see def. 2). It is eaten with fish, cold meat, etc. There are two or three qualities of soy, but the Japanese soy is reckoned the best.

I have been told that soy is made with a fishy composition, and it seems most likely by the Taste; tho' a Gentleman of my Acquaintance who was very intimate with one that sailed often from Tonquin to Japan, from whence true Soy comes, told me that it was made only with Wheat and a sort of Beans mixt with Water and Salt. Dampier, Voyages, II. 28.

From travellers accustom'd from a boy
To eat their salmon, at the least, with soy.
Byron, Beppo, vii.

2. The soy-bean or -pea, Glycine Soja (Soja hispida, etc.). It is an annual leguminous plant with stout nearly erect or somewhat climbing stems covered with rusty hairs, bearing trifoliate leaves and from their axils two or three pods 1½ or 2 inches long. The seeds are made into the above sauce and variously used in cookery; an oil is also expressed from them, and the residue is extensively used in China for feeding cattle and as a fertilizer. The plant is native from northern India to Japan. The cultivated plant differs somewhat from the wild, and by some authors is distinguished as Glycine hispida. Also Sahuca bean.

soya (soi'ȧ), n. [< Hind. soyā, soā, fennel.] Dill. Also sowa.

soy-bean (soi'bēn), n. See soy, 2.

soylet. An obsolete spelling of soil[1], soil[2], soil[5].

Soymida (soi'mi-dȧ), n. [NL. (Adrien de Jussieu, 1830), from the Telugu name.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Meliaceæ and tribe Swieteniex. It is characterized by flowers with five petals, united stamens forming a short ten-lobed tube or cup, the lobes two-toothed, with sessile anthers between the teeth, and an ovoid five-celled ovary which ripens into a woody septifragal capsule with compressed and winged seeds destitute of albumen. The only species, S. febrifuga, is a native of the East Indies, where it is known as rohan (or rohun) and redwood. (See also rohun-bark (under bark[2]) and juribali.) It is a tall tree with bitter bark and hard wood, bearing abruptly pinnate leaves with obtuse opposite leaflets, and flowers in axillary and terminal panicles.

soy-pea (soi'pē), n. See soy, 2.

Sozobranchia (sō-zō-brang'ki-ȧ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σώζειν, save, keep, + NL. branchia, gills: see branchiæ.] A group of urodele amphibians which do not lose the gills or tail. See Perennibranchiata.

sozobranchiate (sō-zō-brang'ki-āt), a. [< NL. sozobranchiatus, < Gr. σώζειν, save, keep, + NL. branchiatus: see branchiate.] Preserving the gills, as a urodele amphibian; perennibranchiate.

Sozura (sō-zū'rȧ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of sozurus: see sozurous.] Urodele (or tailed) gill-less batrachians, or those batrachians which lose the gills, but not the tail, when adult. They are a higher group than the Sozobranchia, both being together contrasted with the Anura or tailless batrachians.

sozurous (sō-zū'rus), a. [< NL. sozurus, < Gr. σώζειν, save, keep, + οὐρά, tail.] Retaining the tail; pertaining to the Sozura, or having their characters.

sozzle (soz'l), v. t.; pret. and pp. sozzled, ppr. sozzling. [A var. of sossle.] 1. To mingle confusedly. [Prov. Eng.]—2. To spill or wet through carelessness.—3. To splash. [U. S.]

A sandpiper glided along the shore; she ran after it, but could not catch it; she sat down and sozzled her feet in the foam. S. Judd, Margaret, p. 8.

sozzle (soz'l), n. [< sozzle, v.] A state of sloppy disorder. [U. S.]

The woman, who in despite of poverty and every discouragement had always hated, to the very roots of her hair, anything like what she called a sozzle — who had always been screwed up and sharp set to hard work.
Mrs. Whitney, Leslie Goldthwsite, vii.

sozzly (soz'li), a. [< sozzle + -y[1].] Sloppy; draggled; mentally flabby; shiftless. [New Eng.]

Folks growa helpleaser all the time, and the help grows sozzlier; and it comes to sauciness . . . and changes.
Mrs. Whitney, The Other Girls, xiii.

Sp. An abbreviation of Spanish.

sp. An abbreviation: (a) in phar., of spiritus, spirit; (b) in bot., of species, specimen; (c) in zoöl., of species only: when two or more species are meant, spp. is used.

s. p. An abbreviation of sine prole, without issue.

spa (spä or spâ), n. [Formerly also spaw; < Spa, or Spaa, in the eastern part of Belgium, where there are mineral springs.] A mineral spring, or the locality in which such springs exist.

Past cure of physic, spaw, or any diet.
Beau. and Fl., Scornful Lady, iii. 2.

Never knew her better; . . . she has been as healthy as the German Spa. Sheridan, Rivals, ii. 1.

spaadt (späd), n. [< D. spaath = F. spath = Sp. espato = Pg. espatho = It. spato, < MHG. spât, G. spat, spath, friable stone, splinter, spar; origin unknown. Cf. feldspath.] A kind of mineral; spar.

English talc, of which the coarser sort is called plaister, the finer, spaad, earth-flax, or salamander's hair.
Woodward. (Johnson.)

space (spās), n. [< ME. space, < OF. (and F.) espace = Pr. espaci = Sp. espacio = Pg. espaço = It. spazio, < L. spatium, room, space, distance, interval, a public walk, etc., lit. 'that which is drawn out,' < √ spa, draw out; cf. Gr. σπᾶν, draw, draw out, Skt. √ sphā, fatten. Cf. span[1], spade[1].] 1. The general receptacle of things; room, (a) as a character of the universe, (b) as a cognition or psychological phenomenon, (c) as a mathematical system. That which is real about space is that the manifoldness of the universe is subject to certain general laws or limitations. In this respect it is like any other uniformity of nature; it is peculiar only in the peculiar way in which we view it — namely, in this, that instead of thinking it, as we do other laws, as abstract and general, we seem to see it, we individualize it and its parts. This peculiarity does not, however, constitute the cognition of space as entirely sui generis, for there is a tendency to individualize other laws. The conception of space is formed, or at least connected with objects, by means of the so-called local signs, by which the excitation of one nerve-terminal is distinguishable from a similar excitation of another, and which are analogous to the signs by which we distinguish present experiences from memories, imaginations, and expectations. These local signs are also the origin of our idea of individuality; so that it is not strange that this mode of being becomes attributed not merely to moving objects, but to the space and time that constitute the law of motion. The celebrated doctrine of Kant was that space is a form of pure intuition — that is, is an idea imported by the mind into cognition, and corresponding to nothing in the things in themselves (though he did not hold that special spatial relations were altogether illusory) — just as color is a quality of sensation which in its generality corresponds to nothing in the object, though differences of color correspond to differences in objects. That this intuition of space is individual, not general, and that no outward intuition is possible except under this form, were points also insisted upon by Kant. At present there are, broadly speaking, two views of space-perception. One is the great doctrine of Berkeley — worked out in different directions by J. S. Mill, Helmholtz, Lotze, Wundt, and others — that the idea of space is evoked under the combined influence of retinal sensations and of muscular sensations of motion, in a manner analogous to that by which the laws of dynamics have been evolved from experience. This is the theory which, under one modification or another, is held by almost all modern scientific psychologists. Some competent writers, however, oppose this, holding that "all our sensations are positively and inexplicably extensive wholes." This opinion conflicts with the usual one only in so far as it clings to the inexplicability and irrationality of space. The vulgar conception of space as a sort of thing or substance of a different category from material things, through which the latter move without sensible resistance, is acceptable to mathematicians, who find that such a construction lends itself remarkably to their diagrammatic reasoning. For the geometer, space is primarily a system of points having the following properties: (1) It is continuous. See continuity, 2. (2) It is unlimited, whether the part at a finite distance from a given point be limited or not. (3) It has three dimensions — that is, a set of three numbers varying continuously may be placed in continuous one-to-one correspondence with the points of space. By a continuous correspondence is meant one in which a continuous variation in one member will correspond in every case to a continuous variation in the other. (4) All the points of space have perfectly similar spatial relations. (5) It is possible for a rigid body to move in space, and such a body is fixed by the fixation of three points, but not fewer. (6) Any figure may be magnified while preserving the proportionality of all its lines. Geometers often imagine these properties to be modified. In particular, they use the hypothesis of a space of four or more dimensions. They also often suppose the principle of similar figures, or, what is the same thing, the doctrine of parsliels, to be false, thus producing what is known as the non-Euclidean geometry. This is of various kinds.

Now to pure space lifts her ecstatic stare,
Now, running round the circle, finds it square.
Pope, Dunciad, iv. 33.

Stars countless, each in his appointed place,
Fast anchor'd in the deep abyss of space.
Cowper, Retirement, l. 84.

2. The interval between any two or more objects, or between terminal points; distance; extent, as of surface: as, the space of a mile.

And so he hym chased as faste as his horse myght hym bere, till he hadde lefte his felowes be-hynde the space of an arblaste. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 194.

There shall be a space between you and it [the ark] about two thousand cubits by measure. Josh. iii. 4.

I warrant he hath a thousand of these letters, writ with blank space for different names.
Shak., M. W. of W., ii. 1. 77.

Four gray walls, and four gray towers,
Overlook a space of flowers.
Tennyson, Lady of Shalott, i.

3. The interval between two points of time; quantity of time; duration.

There was silence in heaven about the space of half an hour. Rev. viii. 1.

Mean space I thinke to goe downe into Kente.
Cushman, quoted in Bradford's Plymouth Plantation, p. 37.

Nine times the space that measures day and night
To mortal men he with his horrid crew
Lay vanquish'd, rolling in the fiery gulf.
Milton, P. L., i. 50.

4. A short time; a while.

And, sith for me ye fight, to me this grace
Both yield, to stay your deadly stryfe a space.
Spenser, F. Q., II. vi. 33.

And Arthur and his knighthood for a space
Were all one will. Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

5. Hence, time in which to do something; respite; opportunity; leisure.

Avyseth yow on it, when ye han space,
And of som goodely answere yow purchace.
Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 1124.

And I gave her space to repent. Rev. ii. 21.

6†. A path; course (?).

This ilke monk leet olde thynges pace,
And heeld after the newe world the space.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 176.

7. In printing, one of the blank types which separate the words in print. The thicknesses most used are one third, one fourth, and one fifth of the square body of the text-type. Hair-spaces, still thinner, are also made. Spaces as thick as one half the square body and all thicker are known as quadrats.

8. In musical notation, one of the degrees between the lines of the staff. In the usual staff there are four spaces within the staff, but in the Gregorian staff there are only three. The name and significance of a space depend on the clef and the key-signature. See staff.

9. In ornith., an unfeathered place on the skin between pterylæ; an apterium. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 87.— Absolute, algebraic, basal space. See the adjectives.— Added space. Same as leger space.— Barycentric coördinates in space. Same as tetrahedral coördinates (which see, under coördinate).— Berth and space. See berth[2].— Cell-spaces, the spaces in the ground-substance of connective tissue which inclose the connective-tissue corpuscles.— Chyle-spaces, the central lymphatic cavities of the intestinal villi.— Complemental space of pleura, the portion of the pleural cavity immediately above the insertion of the diaphragm, which is not filled by air in ordinary breathing.— Dangerous space (milit.), the zone before and behind the object fired at covered by the trajectory. See battle-range, under battle[1].— Dead space, in fort. Same as dead angle (which see, under angle[3]).— Deep cardiac space, the projection on the surface of the chest of the lung-covered portions of the heart. It borders on each side the superficial cardiac space.— Elliptic, Euclidean, extramundane, gastrovascular space. See the adjectives.— Fontana's spaces. Same as canal of Fontana (which see, under canal[1]).— Geometry of space. See geometry.— Half-space or foot-space, in a staircase, a resting-place or broad space between two flights of steps.— Haversian spaces. See Haversian canal, under canal[1].— Hemal, hyperbolic, intercellular, interdental space. See the adjectives.— Hypoprostatic space, the space lying between the rectum and the prostate. Buchanan.— Interlamellar spaces, the spaces between the lamellæ of the cornea.— Interosseous space, the space between parallel long bones.— Interpeduncular space, the triangular space at the base of the brain, between the crura cerebri.— Interpleural, ivory, leger space. See the adjectives.— Lenticular space. See lenticular mark, under lenticular.— Linear, local, maxillopharyngeal, meant, middle, parabolic, parasinoidal, perforated, periocular, popliteal, etc., space. See the adjectives. — Polar coördinates in space. See coördinate.— Quarter-space, a landing or interval at an angle-turn of a stair.— Retroperitoneal space. See retroperitoneal.— Room and space. See room[1].— Superficial cardiac space, the area on the surface of the chest over that part of the heart which is not covered by the lung. It is represented with approximate accuracy by a right-angled triangle bounded by the midsternal line, a horizontal line through the point of the apex beat, and a line drawn through that point and the intersection of the midsternal line with a horizontal line through the fourth costosternal articulation.

space (spās), v.; pret. and pp. spaced, ppr. spacing. [< space, n. Cf. spatiate, expatiate.] I.† intrans. To move at large; expatiate. [Rare.]

But she, as Fayes are wont, in privie place
Did spend her dayes, and lov'd in forests wyld to space.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. ii. 44.

II. trans. 1. To set at intervals; put a space between; specifically, in printing, to arrange the spaces and intervals in or between so that there may be no obvious disproportion: as, to space a paragraph; to space words, lines, or letters.

The porch, too, is open, and consists of columns spaced equidistantly over its floor, without either the bracketing arrangements of the southern or the domical forms of the northern styles. J. Fergusson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 389.

2. To divide into spaces.

The artificer is ordered "to set up the frames, and to space out the rooms, that the Nine Worthies may be so instauled as best to please the eye."
Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 27.

3. To measure by paces. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—Spaced braid, a white cotton braid used for the trimming of washable garments. The name is derived from the pattern, which exhibits flat and simple spaces between raised edging.—To space out, in printing, to put more spaces between the words or lines of.

space-box (spās′boks), n. In printing, a petty case of wood or millboard, in six or eight divisions, holding the spaces needed for corrections on stone. Sometimes called space-barge or space-paper in England.

space-curvature (spās′kėr″vā-tūr), n. A curvature of three-dimensional space in a space of four dimensions.

spaceful (spās′fûl), a. [< space + -ful.] Wide; extensive. Sandys.

space-homology (spās′hō-mol″ō-ji), n. Geometrical homology in three dimensions.

space-line (spās′līn), n. In printing, same as *lead*², 3.

space-mark (spās′märk), n. See proof-reading.

space-perception (spās′pėr-sep″shon), n. The perception of space—that is, of bodies as extended or moving.

spacer (spā′sėr), n. 1. A device used in cable telegraphy for reversing the current at proper intervals, thus increasing the speed of transmission: also used for a somewhat similar purpose on land-lines.—2. In a typewriter, a key, and the mechanism connected with it, by which spaces are made between words.

space-relation (spās′rē-lā″shon), n. A spatial relation, such as that two points lie within a tetrahedron of which four others are the vertices, and the like.

space-rule (spās′röl), n. In printing, a hairline of type-metal, type-high and about one thirty-sixth of an inch thick. Such rules are made of many lengths, from one twelfth of an inch to half an inch. They are used for cross-lines in table-work.

space-writing (spās′rī″ting), n. In newspaper work, the system of payment to reporters or other writers in proportion to the space allowed to their articles in print; also, writing or work under this system.

The standard of literary excellence in the news columns of the New York press has also been lowered by the general substitution of space writing for the work of salaried reporters, as well as by the influence already referred to.
Westminster Rev., CXXVIII. 858.

spacial, spaciality, etc. See spatial, etc.

spacing (spā′sing), n. [Verbal n. of space, v.] 1. The making of spaces. (a) The allowing and gaging of intervals between words in setting type, typewriting, or the like.

The change in the spacing being effected by a small cam at the side of the carriage. Sci. Amer., N. S., LV. 24.

(b) In art, mach., etc., the division of any surface into special parts.

In the spaces of decoration, as in all else, the Japanese artist studiously avoids uniformity or repetition of exact spacing. Encyc. Brit., XIII. 591.

2. A space thus made.

Each tongue upon discs is cut slantingly across at regular spacings by steam passages analogous to the guide-plate vents of water turbines. The Engineer, LXIX. 225.

3. Spaces collectively.

spacing-lace (spā′sing-lās), n. Same as seaming-lace.

spacious (spā′shus), a. [Formerly also spatious; < F. spacieux = Sp. espacioso = Pg. espaçoso = It. spazioso, < L. spatiosus, roomy, ample, < spatium, room, space: see space.] 1. Inclosing an extended space; of great extent; wide-extended.

As though no other place, on Britain's spacious earth,
Were worthy of his end, but where he had his birth.
Drayton, Polyolbion, i. 189.

The spacious firmament on high,
With all the blue ethereal sky.
Addison, Ode, Spectator, No. 465.

2. Having large or ample room; not contracted or narrow; roomy.

On the North side of the Church is a spatious Court, which I could not conjecture to be less than one hundred and fifty yards long, and eighty or one hundred broad.
Maundrell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 126.

Those melodious bursts that fill
The spacious times of great Elizabeth.
Tennyson, Fair Women.

3†. Extensive; on a large scale; abounding: said of persons.

Is't possible that such a spacious villain
Should live, and not be plagued?
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, i. 1.

=Syn. Wide, capacious, ample, broad.

spaciously (spā′shus-li), adv. In a spacious manner; widely; extensively; roomily.

spaciousness (spā′shus-nes), n. The quality of being spacious; largeness of extent; extensiveness; roominess.

spadassin (spad′a-sin), n. [< F. spadassin, < It. spadaccino, swordsman, < spada, sword: see *spade*¹, spathe.] A swordsman; especially, a person devoted to fencing and presumed to be expert with the sword; hence, less properly, a bravo.

Bully swordamen, spadassins of that party, go swaggering; or indeed they can be had for a trifle of money.
Carlyle. (Imp. Dict.)

spaddle (spad′l), n. [Dim. of *spade*¹. Cf. *paddle*².] A little spade; a spud. [Obsolete or provincial.]

Others destroy moles with a spaddle, waiting in the mornings and evenings for them. Mortimer, Husbandry.

spade¹ (spād), n. [< ME. spade, < AS. spadu, spædu, also rarely spada, spad, in an early gloss spadi, = OS. spado = OFries. spada = MD. spade, spaeye, D. spade, spa = MLG. or curved) may be pressed into the ground or other resisting substance with one foot, and a handle, usually with a crosspiece at the top, to be grasped by both hands. A spade differs from a two-handed shovel chiefly in the form and thickness of the blade.

Tho nomen heo spade and schouele and ner the place wende, Deope heo gonne to delue ther as the smoke out wende.
Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 43.

Strength may wield the pond'rous spade,
May turn the clod, and wheel the compost home.
Cowper, Task, iii. 636.

2. A tool of soft iron used with diamond-powder by cameo-cutters in finishing.—3. In whaling, a large chisel-like implement used on blubber or bone in cutting-in. See phrases following.—4. In herpet., a formation on the foot of some toads with which they dig. See spade-foot.—Boat-spade, an instrument, carried under the stern-sheets of a whale-boat, resembling a very large chisel, having a wide blade, and a handle six or eight feet long. This instrument was employed to stop a running whale by the process known as hamstringing or spading flukes (cutting the cords about the small), which required much experience and dexterity, and was a very hazardous undertaking; it has been done away with by the introduction of bomb-lances. The boat-spade is still carried in case of emergency.—Bone-spade, a cutting-spade, with a long thin shank, used by whalers for cutting out the throat-bone of a baleen-whale.—Cutting-spade, a sharp instrument like a very large narrow chisel fixed to a pole ten or more feet in length, used for cutting the blubber from a whale.—Half-round spade, a long-handled spade with a blade curved, or rolled up on the sides, resembling a carpenters' gouge, and used for cutting holes in the head of the blubber when boarding.—Shoeing of a spade, in her., same as spade-iron, 2 (b).—To call a spade a spade, to call things by their proper names, even though these may seem homely or coarse; speak plainly and without mincing matters. Various unnecessary conjectures have been made as to the supposed occult origin of this phrase; but it means what it says—to call a simple thing by its simple name, without circumlocution or affected elegance.

Chesham does not like to call a spade a spade. He calls it a horticultural utensil. Thackeray, Philip, xxiii.

spade¹ (spād), v. t.; pret. and pp. spaded, ppr. spading. [< *spade*¹, n.] 1. To dig or cut with a spade; dig up (the ground) by means of a spade.—2. In whaling, to use the boat-spade on, as a whale; cut the tendons of the flukes of; hamstring.

> Of all oke growing in England, the parke oke is the softest, and far more spalt and brickle than the hedge oke. Harrison, Descrip. of Eng., ii. 22 (Holinshed's Chron., 1.).

2. Frail; clumsy; heedless; pert. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

spalt[3] (spâlt), n. [< G. spalt(-stein), spalt, lit. 'splinter-stone,' < spalten, split (see spalt[1]), + stein, stone.] A whitish scaly mineral, used to promote the fusion of metals.

span[1] (span), v.; pret. and pp. spanned, ppr. spanning. [< ME. spannen, < AS. spannan, sponnan (pret. spéonn), gespannan, bind, connect, = D. spannan, stretch, bend, hoist, cock (a gun), hitch (horses), = MLG. LG. spannen = OHG. spannan, MHG. G. spannen, extend, connect, = Icel. spenna, span, clasp, = Sw. spänna, stretch, strain, draw, = Dan. spænde, stretch, strain, span, buckle; √ span, perhaps, with present formative -n, < √ spa, extend, in Gr. σπάειν, σπᾶν, draw, draw out (see spasm), L. spatium, extension, space (see space). Cf. spin, speed.] I. trans. 1†. To stretch or spread out; extend in continuity; give extent to.

> My right hand hath spanned [spread out, R. V.] the heavens. Isa. xlviii. 13.

2. To stretch from side to side or from end to end of; extend over or across; continue through or over the extent of.

> This soul doth span the world. G. Herbert, Content.

> The Rhyndacus is still spanned by an ancient bridge of three arches. B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 295.

> The existing church shows portions of work a thousand years apart, and spans nearly the whole of Aquitcian history. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 63.

3. To make a stretch or reach along, over, or around; measure or cover the span of; grasp; specifically, to measure or encompass with the hand, the little finger and thumb being extended as far as possible: as, to span a stream with a log or a bridge; to span a person's wrist.

> Thenne the kinge spanes his spere.
> Avowyng of Arthur, st. 13. (Skeat.)

> Oft on the well-known spot I fix my eyes,
> And span the distance that between us lies.
> Tickell, An Epistle.

> How your plump arms, that were, have dropped away!
> Why, I can span them. Browning, Pippa Passes, iii.

4†. To cock by the use of a spanner, as a wheel-lock musket or pistol.

> Every man, officer and soldier, having a pistol ready spann'd in one hand. Clarendon, Civil Wars, III. 248.

5. Naut., to confine with ropes: as, to span the booms.—6. To shackle the legs of, as a horse; hobble. [Prov. Eng.]

II. intrans. 1. To measure off or mark distances from point to point; make distinct stretches in going, as a span-worm or measuring-worm does.

> If the whale is spanning, i. e. swimming in a decided direction and appearing at the surface at intervals more or less regular, less caution is observed.
> Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 526.

2. To be matched for running in harness; form a span: as, the horses span well. [U. S.]

span[1] (span), n. [< ME. spanne, sponne, < AS. span, a span (def. 4), gespan, a joining, connection, = D. span, a span, a team of horses, = OHG. spanna, MHG. G. spanne (> It. spanna = OF. espan, F. empan) = Icel. spönn (spann-) = Sw. spann = Dan. spand, a span; from the verb.] 1. The full extent or course over which anything is stretched or prolonged; the space or time covered or included between terminal points; entire reach from end to end or from side to side: as, the span of life; the span of a bridge. As used of physical things, span is understood as the actual or net space or distance between bounding lines or surfaces; hence, the span of an arch is the length of the opening between the inner faces of its abutments. Compare def. 2. Often used figuratively.

> The brief span of Roman literature, strictly so called, was suddenly closed under a variety of influences.
> Maine, Village Communities, p. 381.

> Two arches over the same span of river, supposing the butments are at the same depth, are cheaper than one.
> Ruskin, Elements of Drawing.

> Yea, Manhood hath a wider span
> And larger privilege of life than man.
> Lowell, Comm. Ode.

2. A part or division of something between terminal points: as, a bridge of ten spans. In this sense a span would comprise the distance from the middle line of one pier or support to that of the next, the whole number of spans including the entire length of the structure. [The decision of the case referred to in the first quotation turned upon the distinction between senses 1 and 2.]

> The word span does not, even in architecture, always mean a part of a structure. It is, perhaps, as often used to denote the distance or space between two columns. Such is the obvious import of the term as used in the act under consideration, not merely as a part of the structure itself, but the measure of the distance between the piers of the bridge.
> U. S. Supreme Ct., March, 1888. (Judge Lamar.)

> The channel spans were built out from the central pier and from the adjacent flanking spans without the use of false works in either channel. Scribner's Mag., IV. 32.

3. Extent of stretch, physical or mental; distance over which anything may be extended; reach or grasp, as of the memory or of perception. [Rare.]

> Between the ages of eight and nineteen the span of school-girls increases from 6 to 7.9 for letters, and from 6.6 to 8.6 for numerals. Span increases not only with age, but with rank in class, and it is suggested that a "standard span" be added to the items for anthropometric measurement. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 193.

4. As a measure, originally, the extent between the tips of the thumb and little finger when stretched out; the oldest use of the word in English. The span belongs to the system of long measure to which the cubit and fingerbreadth belong. It has always been considered as half a cubit, and still is so in several countries of Asia. The English span is 9 inches. The Swedish spann is an entirely different kind of measure.

> Spanne, mesure of the hand. Palmus.
> Prompt. Parv., p. 467.

> Whyche Morteys ys in Depnesse i] Spannys to the botom; the brede ys sumwhat more thane a Spanne.
> Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 43.

> Atween his shoulders was ae span,
> About his middle war but three.
> The Wee Wee Man (Child's Ballads, I. 126).

5. Figuratively, any short space or period; a brief or limited extent or course; a relatively small measure of continuity.

> Behold, thou hast made my days as it were a span long.
> Book of Common Prayer, Psalter, xxxix. 6.

> For the refreshing of that one span of ground God lets fall a whole shower of rain. Donne, Sermons, x.

> Thyself but Dust; thy Stature but a Span,
> A Moment thy Duration; foolish Man!
> Prior, Solomon, i.

6. The hand with the fingers outspread, as for measuring or for grasping a handful of something. [Rare.]

> And my Conductor, with his spans extended,
> Took of the earth, and, with his flats well filled,
> He threw it into those rapacious gullets.
> Longfellow, tr. of Dante's Inferno, vi. 25.

7. Naut., a rope fastened at both ends so that a purchase may be hooked to its bight; also, a double rope having thimbles attached between its two parts, used as a fair-leader for ropes.—8. (a) In the United States (from the original Dutch usage), a pair of horses or mules harnessed together; particularly, a pair of horses usually driven together, or matched for driving or work. (b) In South Africa, two or more yokes of oxen or bullocks attached to a wagon or a plow. For a wagon the span may consist of from twelve to twenty animals, and for a plow of six or eight.

span[2]. An archaic preterit of spin.

span[3] (span), adv. [The first element in the compound span-new erroneously taken as a separate word: see span-new, and cf. spick-and-span.] Wholly; entirely; freshly: as, my hands are span clean (sometimes spandy clean). Bartlett. [Colloq., U. S.]

spanæmia, spanæmic. See spanemia, etc.

span-block (span′blok), n. Naut., one of two blocks seized into each bight of a span and hung across a masthead for various uses.

spancel (span′sel), n. [< MD. spanseel, spansel, a tether for a horse, a stretched rope, D. spansel, a stretched rope (= G. spann-seil, a tether), < spannen (= G. spannen), stretch (= E. span[1]), + MD. seel, a rope (= OHG. MHG. G. seil, a rope, cord, = E. sole[4]).] A fastening for the hind legs of a horse or cow, or for the legs on one side, to prevent the animal from kicking or straying; especially, a rope for fettering a cow's hind legs while she is milked; a tether. [Prov. Eng.]

> Spancel, a rope to tie a cow's hinder legs.
> Ray (ed. 1674), p. 44.

spancel (span′sel), v. t.; pret. and pp. spanceled or spanceled, ppr. spaneeling or spancelling. [< spancel, n.] To fasten the legs of with a spancel, as those of a cow or horse to prevent the animal from kicking. [Prov. Eng.]—To spancel a crab or a lobster, to stick the point of a leg into the base of each movable claw, to prevent the animal from pinching. This is also done by thrusting a peg into the joint of the nippers or chelæ.

spanceled, spancelled (span′seld), a. [< spancel + -ed[2].] In her., hobbled or fettered to a clog: said of a horse. When the bearing is properly depicted, a fore and a hind leg should have each a fetter-lock above the hoof and fastened to the one end of a heavy clog.

A Horse Spanceled.

span-counter† (span′koun″tėr), n. [< span[1], v., + obj. counter[2].] An old game in which one player threw a counter on the ground, and another tried to hit it with his counter, or to get so near to it that he could span the space between them and touch both the counters. In either case he won; if not, his counter remained where it fell, and became a mark for the first player, and so alternately till the game was won. The game was apparently similar to that of pitching pennies, and it was also called span-farthing and span-feather. Halliwell.

> Tell the king from me that, for his father's sake, Henry the Fifth, in whose time boys went to span-counter for French crowns, I am content he shall reign.
> Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iv. 2. 166.

span-dogs (span′dogz), n. pl. A pair of iron bars linked together at one end and having sharp hooks at the other, used for grappling timber. See cut under dog.

spandrel (span′drel), n. [Also spandril, formerly splaundrel, spaundere; origin obscure.] In arch., the triangular space comprehended between the outer curve or extrados of an arch, a horizontal line drawn through its apex, and a vertical line through its springing; also, the wall-space between the outer moldings of two arches and a horizontal line or string-course above them, or between these outer moldings and the intrados of another arch rising above and inclosing the two. In medieval architecture the spandrels are often ornamented with tracery, sculptured foliage, and the like. See cut on following page.

spandrel-wall (span′drel-wâl), n. A wall built on the extrados of an arch, filling in the spandrel.

spandy (span′di), adv. A dialectal extension of span[3]. [Colloq., New Eng.]

Spaniard (span′yärd), n. [= D. Spaniaard; with suffix -ard (cf. G. Dan. Spanier = Sw. Spanior, with suffix cognate with *-er*1), < Spain (G. Spanien, etc.), < L. Hispania, Spain, < Hispani, the inhabitants of Hispania or Spain. The Rom. adj. is F. espagnol (> ME. Spainolde, n.) = Sp. Español = Pg. Hespanhol = It. Spagnuolo, < ML. NL. Hispaniolus, < L. Hispania, Spain (whence ult. E. spaniel). The L. adjectives are Hispanus, Hispaniensis, and Hispanicus (see Hispanic).] A native or a citizen of Spain, a kingdom of southwestern Europe, forming the greater part of the Iberian peninsula; in general, a member of the Spanish race, of mixed Celtic, Latin, Gothic, Arabic, and other elements, but now ranked as one of the Latin peoples.

spaniel (span′yel or span′el), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also spannel; < ME. spaniel, spanzelle, spaynyel, spaynel, spanezeole, < OF. espagneul, espagnol, F. épagneul, a spaniel, orig. OF. chien espagnol, F. chien épagneul, a Spanish dog; < Sp. Español, Spanish: see Spaniard.] I. n. 1. A dog of a domestic breed, of medium and small sizes, with a long silky and usually curly coat, long, soft, drooping ears, feathered tail and stern, of docile, timid, and affectionate disposition, much used for sporting purposes and as pets. The most usual colors are liver and white, red and white, or black and white, in broken or massed areas, sometimes deep brown or black on the face or breast, with a tan mark over the eye. Spaniels sport or are bred into many strains, and three classes of them are sometimes distinguished: land- or field-spaniels, including the cocker and springer; water-spaniels; and toy spaniels, as the King Charles and the Blenheim. The English spaniel is a superior and very pure breed; and, although the name spaniel would seem to indicate a Spanish origin, it is most probably indigenous. This dog was used in the days of falconry to start the game. The King Charles is a small black-and-tan variety of the spaniel; the Blenheim is similar, but white marked with red or yellow; both should have a rounded head with short muzzle, full eyes, and well-fringed ears and feet. The Maltese dog and the lion-dog are also small toy spaniels, used as lap-dogs. The water-spaniels, large and small, differ from the common spaniel in the roughness of their coats, and in uniting the aquatic propensities of the Newfoundland dog with the fine hunting qualities of their own race. Leading strains of the springers are the Clumber, Norfolk, and Sussex, in different colors.

2. Figuratively, a mean, cringing, fawning person; a blindly submissive follower: from the characteristics of the spaniel in relation to its master, or when in a state of fear.

He, unhappy man! whom your advancement
Hath ruin'd by being spaniel to your fortunes,
Will curse he train'd me hither. Ford, Fancies, iii. 3.

II. a. Like a spaniel; fawningly submissive; mean; servile; cringing.

Low-crooked court'sies, and base spaniel-fawning. Shak., J. C., iii. 1. 43.

spaniel (span′yel or span′el), v. [< spaniel, n.] I. intrans. To fawn; cringe; be obsequious. Churchill.

II. trans. To follow like a spaniel. Shak., A. and C., iv. 12. 21.

H. Knight*.—Spanish trefoil. Same as tucerne.—Spanish type of poultry, an economically important group of varieties of the domestic hen, originating in the lands bordering on the Mediterranean, and characteristic of that region. The disposition of these fowls is restless and vivacious; the form somewhat slender, approaching the games; comb typically high and deeply serrated, although there are rose-combed varieties of some of the breeds; size small to medium. The hens are non-sitters, and very superior layers; the eggs are white. The colors vary according to the breed. The ear-lobes are enameled-white. The group includes the Ancona, Andalusian, Leghorns, Minoreas, and white-faced black Spanish.—Spanish walnut oil. See oil.—Spanish white. See white.—Spanish woodbine. Same as Spanish arbor-vine.—Spanish wormseed. See wormseed.—To ride the Spanish mare. See ride.—To walk Spanish, to be forced to walk on tiptoe by another, who seizes one by the collar and by the seat of the trousers: a sport of boys; hence, to walk gingerly; act under the compulsion of another. [Colloq., U. S.]

II. n. 1. The language of Spain, one of the Romance languages, but much mixed with other elements and altered by them. Of its many dialects, that of Castile became the standard form in cultivated speech and literature, the language of which is hence distinctively called Castilian. It is the prevailing language in Mexico, Central America, and those countries of South America which were settled by Spaniards.

2. A white-faced black Spanish fowl. See Spanish fowl, under I.

Spanish-flag (span'ish-flag'), n. A scorpænoid fish, Sebastes rubririnctus, of the coast of California, attaining a length of fifteen inches, and in life one of the most brilliantly colored fishes in American waters. sparerib (spār'rib), n. [Formerly also spear-rib; < spare[1] + rib[1].] A cut of pork consisting of the upper part of a row of ribs with the meat adhering to them. Sparerib roasted or broiled is esteemed a delicacy.

Sparganium (spär-gā'ni-um), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. sparganion, < Gr. σπαργάνιον, a plant, bur-reed, so called from the ribbon-like leaves, dim. of σπάργανον, a fillet, a swaddling-band, < σπάργειν, swathe.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, of the order Typhaceæ. It is distinguished from the other genus of that order, Typha, by hyaline scales of the perianth, oblong or wedge-shaped anthers, and sessile ovary. There are about 6 species, natives of both hemispheres in temperate and subfrigid regions. Three somewhat polymorphous species occur in the northeastern United States. They are aquatic herbs, sending up from Bur-reed (Sparganium curycarpum).

1. Flowering plant. 2. Part of the inflorescence, showing the globular female head.

slender rootstocks erect or floating smooth spongy stems, and alternate entire linear leaves, usually with a sheathing base, stiffly ascending at a wide angle with the stem (whence they were formerly called reed-grass). The flowers form globular heads, the upper staminate, the lower pistillate, in fruit becoming spherical compact bur-like bodies composed of many sharp-pointed spongy nutlets (whence the popular name bur-reed). They are sometimes planted along the margin of water. The stems have been used to make paper, and the roots of S. ramosum and S. simplex were once in repute as a remedy for snake-bites.

sparganosis (spär-ga-nō′sis), n. [NL., as if < Gr. σπαργάνωσις, wrapping in swaddling-clothes (see Sparganium); prop. spargosis, < Gr. σπάργωσις, a swelling, distention: see spargosis.] Same as spargosis.

sparge (spärj), v. t.; pret. and pp. sparged, ppr. sparging. [Sc. spairge; < L. spargere, strew, sprinkle; cf. aspergc, asperse, disperse, etc.] 1. To sprinkle; scatter.

> Wha in yon cavern, grim and sootie,
> Closed under hatches,
> Spairges about the brunstane cootie.
> Burns, Address to the De'il.

2. To throw water upon in a shower of small drops. See sparger.

spargefaction† (spär-jē-fak′shon), n. [< L. spargere, strew, sprinkle, + factio(n-), < facere, do, make.] The act of sprinkling. Swift, Tale of a Tub, iv.

sparger (spär′jėr), n. [< sparge + *-er*1.] 1. A sprinkler; usually, a cup with a perforated lid, or a pipe with a perforated nozle, used for damping paper, clothes, etc.—2. In brewing, a perforated cylinder, or a series of disks, for discharging hot water in a fine shower over grain falling into a mash-tub.

spargett, spargeting†. Same as parget, pargeting.

spargosis (spär-gō′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. σπάργωσις, a swelling, distention, < σπαργᾶν, be full to bursting, swell.] In pathol.: (a) Distention of the breasts with milk. (b) Same as pachydermia. Also sparganosis.

sparhawk (spär′hâk), n. A contracted form of sparrow-hawk. Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 338.

Sparidæ (spar′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sparus + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Sparus, to which different limits have been assigned; the sea-breams. (a) In the early system of Bonaparte, same as Cuvier's fourth family of acanthopterygian fishes (Sparoides), which included, besides the true Sparidæ, many other fishes. (b) In Günther's system, a family of Acanthopterygii perciformes, having ventrals perfect, no bony stay for the preoperculum, a lateral line, and either a series of trenchant teeth in the jaws or molars on the sides. (c) In Jordan and Gilbert's classification, acanthopterygian fishes of the ordinary type with the supramaxillary bones slipping under the preorbital. It thus included not only the true Sparidæ, but the Pristoponidæ, Lutjanidæ, Pimelepteridæ, and Lobotidæ. (d) By Gill restricted to fishes of an oblong compressed form with peculiar scales, continuous lateral line, head compressed, supramaxillary bones retractile under the suborbitals, dorsal with the spinous part depressible in a groove and about as long as the soft part, pectorals with lower rays branched, and ventrals subbrachial and complete. The family thus limited comprises numerous species, among which are some of the most esteemed of the temperate seas, such as the giltheads of Europe, and the sheepshead and scup of the eastern American coast. Also Sparoidæ. See cuts under Pimelepterus, porgy, Scorpis, scup, and sheepshead.

sparidal (spar′i-dal), a. Same as sparoid.

Sparinæ (spā-rī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Sparus + -inæ.] A subfamily of sparoid fishes, typified by the genus Sparus, to which various limits have been assigned. (a) The genera Sparus, Sargus, and Charax: the Sparini of Bonaparte. (b) By Jordan and Gilbert used for sparoids having molar teeth on the sides of the jaws, none on vomer, palatines, or tongue, entire opercle, and few pyloric cæca, including Sparus, Sargus, or Diplodus, and various other genera.

sparine (spar′in), a. and n. [< sparus + *-ine*1.] I. a. Sparoid, in a narrow sense; closely resembling a sparus; belonging to the Sparinæ.

II. n. A sparoid fish of the subfamily Sparinæ.

sparing (spär′ing), n. [< ME. sparynge; verbal n. of *spare*1, v.] 1. Parsimony.

> Sparynge. Parcimonia. Prompt. Parv., p. 467.

2. pl. That which is saved by frugality or economy; savings. [Rare.]

> The sparings of the whole week which have not been laid out for chances in the lottery are spent for this evening's amusement. Howells, Venetian Life, v.

3†. The state of being spared from harm or death.

> If the Lord give you sparing to-morrow, let me hear four words of comfort from you for God's sake.
> J. Careless, in Bradford's Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 241.

sparing (spär′ing), p. a. [Ppr. of *spare*1, v.] 1. Inclined to spare or save; economical; frugal; chary; grudging.

> Too near and sparing for a soldier,
> Too gripping, and too greedy.
> Fletcher (and another ?), Prophetess, i. 2.
>
> Defer not to do Justice, or be sparing of Mercy.
> Baker, Chronicles, p. 166.

2. Of a spare amount, quantity, or extent; not abundant or lavish; limited; scanty; restrained: as, a sparing diet; sparing applause.

> The use of confutation in the delivery of sciences ought to be very sparing. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

3†. Inclined to spare from harm or hardship; not oppressive; forbearing.

> Their king . . . was sparing and compassionate towards his subjects. Bacon.

sparingly (spär′ing-li), adv. In a sparing manner; with frugality, moderation, scantiness, reserve, forbearance, or the like; sparsely.

> Touch this sparingly, as 'twere far off.
> Shak., Rich. III., iii. 5. 93.

sparingness (spär′ing-nes), n. The character of being sparing or inclined to spare; especially, frugality, scantiness, or the like: as, the sparingness of one's diet.

> A year afterward he entered the ministry again, and lived with the utmost sparingness.
> George Eliot, Felix Holt, vi.

spark1 (spärk), n. [< ME. sparke, sperke, spare, spære, spearke, < AS. spearca, spærca = MD. sparcke, spercke, D. spark = MLG. LG. sparke (> OF. esparque), a spark; perhaps so called from the crackling of a firebrand: cf. Icel. Sw. spraka = Dan. sprage, crackle, Lith. sprageti, crackle, Gr. σφάραγος, a crackling, Skt. √sphūrj, rumble.] 1. A particle of ignited substance emitted from a body in combustion; a fiery particle thrown off by burning wood, iron, powder, or other substance.

> He muhte . . . blowen so litheliche thet sum sperke muhte acwikien. Ancren Riwle, p. 96.
>
> Man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upward.
> Job v. 7.

Hence—2. A scintillating or flying emanation, literally or figuratively; anything resembling a spark of fire: as, sparks from a gem; a spark of wit.

> To try if it were possible to get a spark of human spirit out of you. Scott, Woodstock, v.
>
> For all the haft twinkled with diamond sparks.
> Tennyson, Passing of Arthur.

3. A small diamond used with many others to form a setting or frame, as to a cameo or a miniature painting; also, a distinct crystal of diamond with the natural curved edges, suitable for glaziers' use.

> This madonna invites me to a banquet for my discourse, t'other . . . sends me a spark, a third a ruby, a fourth an emerald. Shirley, Bird in a Cage, ii. 1.
> These writing diamonds are sparks set in steel tubes much like everpoint pencils. Lea, Photography, p. 427.

4. A separate bit or particle of fire or burning matter in an otherwise inert body or mass; hence, a bit of anything, material or immaterial, comparable to this in its nuclear character or possible extension of activity.

> If any spark of life be unquench'd in her,
> This will recover her.
> Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, iii. 2.
>
> If the true spark of religious and civil liberty be kindled, it will burn.
> D. Webster, Speech, Bunker Hill Monument, June 17, 1825.

Electric spark, the luminous effect produced when a sudden disruptive electrical discharge takes place between two charged conductors, or between two conductors at different electric potentials. The length of the spark depends primarily upon the difference of potential of the two charged bodies; it is hence in general a conspicuous phenomenon with high potential frictional electricity, and not with ordinary voltaic currents. See electricity.—Fairy sparks. See fairy.

spark1 (spärk), v. [< ME. sparken, < AS. spearcian = MLG. LG. sparken, emit sparks; from the noun: see *spark*1, n.] I. intrans. 1. To emit sparks, as of fire or electricity; sparkle or scintillate. Spenser.—2. In elect., to produce sparks at points where the continuity of the circuit is interrupted. The production of sparks is due to the formation of a small arc between the extremities of the broken conductor, and also to self-induction in the circuit. Sparking often takes place between the collecting brushes and the commutator of the dynamo. It is injurious to the machine, aside from the actual dissipation of energy which it involves. It also occurs to an injurious degree in other electrical apparatus in which currents are frequently interrupted. Various measures are resorted to for the purpose of reducing it to a minimum or avoiding it altogether. See spark-arrester, 3.

> There is no sparking at the brushes.
> S. P. Thompson, Dynamo-Elect. Mach., p. 113.

II. trans. 1. To affect by sparks, as of electricity; act upon by the emission or transmission of sparks. [Recent.]

> The insulation is apt to be sparked through and spoiled.
> Elect. Rev. (Eng.), XXIV. 550.
>
> Whenever a large Leyden jar is sparked through the coil. Philos. Mag., XXVII. 339.

2. To splash with dirt. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng. or Scotch.]

spark2 (spärk), n. [Usually associated with *spark*1, sparkish, sparkling, etc., but perhaps a var. of sprack (cf. ME. sparklich, var. of sprackliche), < Icel. sparkr, usually transposed sprækr, sprightly: see sprack.] 1. A person of a gay or sprightly character; a gay, lively, showy man (or, rarely, in former use, woman); a "blade" or roysterer.

> Robbin Hood upon him set
> With his couragious sparkes.
> True Tale of Robin Hood (Child's Ballads, V. 358).
>
> I will wed thee
> To my great widdowes daughter and sole heire,
> The louely sparke, the bright Laodice.
> Chapman, Widdowes Teares, i. (Davies.)
>
> Their worthy father . . . was, at his years, nearly as wild a spark. Sheridan, School for Scandal, i. 2.

2. A lover; a gallant; a beau. [Colloq.]

> Fly to your spark; he'll tell you more of the matter.
> Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, iii.

spark2 (spärk), v. [< *spark*2, n.] I. intrans. To play the spark or gallant; court. [Colloq.]

> A sure sign that his master was courting, or, as it is termed, sparking, within. Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 432.
>
> The boys that do a good desl of sparking and the girls that have a lot of beaux don't always get married first.
> E. Eggleston, The Graysons, xxxiii.

II. trans. To pay attention to, especially with a view to marriage; court; play the gallant to, in a general sense: as, he is sparking Miss Doe; to spark a girl home. [Colloq.]

spark-arrester (spärk′a-res″tėr), n. 1. A fender of wire netting.—2. A netting or cage of wire placed over the smoke-stack of a steam-engine. In some arresters a deflector is placed in the stack, against which the sparks strike, and fall into a reservoir below. Also called spark-consumer.

3. A device for preventing injurious sparking in electrical apparatus at points where frequent interruptions of the circuit occur, as in telegraph-keys, relays, and similar instruments. It consists in some cases of a spark-coil or high-resistance connective across the point of interruption, so that the circuit is never actually broken, but only greatly reduced. In others it is a condenser whose plates are connected each with one extremity of the broken circuit. In this case the energy of the current induced on breaking is expended in charging the condenser. Also sparker.

spark-coil (spärk′koil), n. See spark-arrester, 3.

spark-condenser (spärk′kon-den″sėr), n. In elect., an instrument having a glass cage in which a spark may be passed between the battery connections. It is used for burning metals or obtaining the spectra of gases, and is designed to isolate the atmosphere in which the experiment is conducted, so as to eliminate accidental disturbing causes, and also to enable the experiment to take place in an atmosphere of any required condensation or tenuity.

spark-consumer (spärk′kon-sū″mėr), n. In a steam-engine, a spark-arrester.

sparked (spärkt), a. [< *spark*1 + *-ed*2.] Variegated. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

sparked-back (spärkt′bak), a. Having a streaked or variegated back; streaked-back: as, the sparked-back plover, the turnstone. [Local, Massachusetts.]

sparker (spär′kėr), n. [< *spark*1 + *-er*1.] Same as spark-arrester, 3.

sparkful† (spärk′fûl), a. [< *spark*1 + -ful.] Sparkish.

> Hitherto will our sparkefull youth laugh at their great grandfather's English. Camden, Remains, Languages.

sparkish (spär′kish), a. [< *spark*1 + *-ish*1. Cf. *spark*2.] Gay; jaunty; sprightly; showy; fine.

> I have been detained by a sparkish coxcomb, who pretended a visit to me. Wycherley, Country Wife, iv. 2.
> A daw, to be sparkish, trick'd himself up with all the gay feathers he could muster. Sir R. L'Estrange.

sparkle (spär′kl), v.; pret. and pp. sparkled, ppr. sparkling. [Early mod. E. also sparcle, sparckle; < ME. sparklen, spearclen, sperclen (= MD. sparckelen); freq. of *spark*1. Cf. sparkle, n.] I. intrans. 1. To emit sparks; send off small ignited particles, as burning fuel, etc.—2. To shine as if giving out sparks; glitter; glisten; scintillate, literally or figuratively: as, a brilliant sparkles; a sparkling beauty; sparkling wit.

> The Sea seemed all of a Fire about us; for every sea that broke sparkled like Lightning.
> Dampier, Voyages, I. 414.
>
> The rosy sky,
> With one star sparkling through it like an eye.
> Byron, Don Juan, ii. 183.

Sparkling heat, such a heat as produces sparks; especially, a degree of heat in a piece of iron or steel that causes it to sparkle or emit sparks under the hammer; a welding-heat.—Sparkling wine, wine characterized by the presence or the emission of carbonic-acid gas in little bubbles which sparkle or glisten in the light. = Syn. 1 and 2. Scintillate, Glitter, etc. (see glare[1], v. i.), coruscate.

II. trans. 1. To emit with coruscations; throw out sparklingly.

> The bright glister of their beames cleare
> Did sparckle forth great light.
> Spenser, F. Q., III. i. 32.

2. To scatter; disperse. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

> The riches of Darius was left alone, and lay sparkled abroade ouer all the fields.
> J. Brende, tr. of Quintus Curtius, III. 43.

3†. To sprinkle; spatter.

> The pauement of the temple is all sparcled with bludde.
> Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, [ed. Arber, p. 196).

sparkle (spär'kl), n. [< ME. sparkle, sparele, with dim. -le, -el, < spark[1]; or < sparkle, v.] 1. A spark; an ignited or a luminous particle, or something comparable to it; a scintillation; a gleam.

> Foure gleedes han we, whiche I shal devyse, > Avaunting, lying, anger, coveitiae,
> Thise foure sparkles longen unto elde.
> Chaucer, Prol. to Reeve's Tale, l. 31.
>
> And drove his heel into the smoulder'd log,
> That sent a blast of sparkles up the flue.
> Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.

2. The act or state of sparkling; emission of sparks or scintillations; sparkling luminosity or luster: used literally or figuratively.

> Swift as the sparkle of a glancing star
> I shoot from heaven, to give him safe convoy.
> Milton, Comus, l. 80.
>
> A zeal and sparkle ran through every part of the paper.
> G. S. Merriam, S. Bowles, II. 359.

sparkleberry (spär'kl-ber"i), n. Same as farkleberry.

sparkler (spärk'lėr), n. [< sparkle + -er[1].] 1. A thing which or a person who sparkles; that which or one who gives off scintillations, as of light, beauty, or wit: often applied specifically to gems, especially the diamond.

> But what would you say, should you see a Sparkler shaking her elbow for a whole night together, and thumping the table with a dice-box? Addison, Guardian, No. 120.
>
> It [Mercury] keeps so near the sun . . . that very few people have ever seen the brilliant sparkler.
> H. W. Warren, Astronomy, p. 113.

2. One of various species of tiger-beetles (Cicindela): so called in allusion to their shining or sparkling appearance when running in the sunshine. See cuts under Cicindela.

sparkless (spärk'les), a. [< spark[1] + -less.] Free from sparks; not emitting sparks: as, a sparkless commutator. Electric Review (Eng.). XXVI. 203.

sparklessly (spärk'les-li), adv. Without the emission of sparks.

sparklet (spärk'let), n. [< spark[1] + -let.] A small spark, or minute sparkle; a scintillating speck. [Rare.]

sparkliness† (spärk'li-nes), n. Sparklingness; sparkling vivacity. Aubrey, Lives (John Suckling).

sparklingly (spärk'ling-li), adv. In a sparkling manner; with twinkling or vivid brilliancy.

sparklingness (spärk'ling-nes), n. The quality of being sparkling; vivid and twinkling luster.

spark-netting (spärk'net'ing), n. A spark-arrester or spark-consumer.

sparling[1] (spär'ling), n. [Also sperling, spirling, sporling, spurling; < ME. sparlynge, sperlyng, sperlynge, spyrlynge = MLG. sperlink = G. spierling (> OF. esperlane, esperlan, F. éperlan; ML. sperlingus), a smelt; cf. D. spiering, a smelt.] 1. A smelt. [Prov. Eng.]

> For sprats and spurlings for your house.
> Tusser, Husbandry.

2. A samlet; a smolt. [Wales.]

sparling[2] (spär'ling), n. [Also starling; < spear[1] + -ling, from the sharp, picked bill.] A tern or sea-swallow. [Prov. Eng.]

sparling-fowl (spär'ling-foul), n. The goosander or merganser, especially the female. J. Latham.

sparlire†, n. [ME., also sparlyre, sperlire, sparlyuer, sperlyuer, the calf of the leg, a muscle, < AS. spærliru, sperlira, spearlira, < spær, spare, + lira, fleshy part of the body without fat or bone: see spare[1] and lire[2].] The calf of the leg.

> Smyit thee the Lord with the moost yuel biel in knees, and in sparlyuers. Wyclif, Deut. xxviii. 35.

spar-maker (spär'mā'kėr), n. A carpenter whose special business is the making of masts, yards, etc.

Sparmannia (spär-man'i-ạ), n. [NL. (Linnæus filius, 1781), named after Andreas Sparmann or Sparrmann, a Swedish naturalist of the 18th century.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Tiliaceæ, the linden family, and of the tribe Tilieæ. It is characterized by the outer stamens being without anthers, the numerous inner ones perfect, and by a globose or ovoid capsule which is echinate with rigid bristles. There are three species, natives of tropical or southern Africa. They are shrubs or trees with soft stellate pubescence, bearing toothed or lobed heart-shaped leaves and white flowers in small terminal umbelliform cymes which are surrounded by an involucre of short bracts. S. Africana is a handsome greenhouse-shrub reaching from 6 to 12 feet high, with ornamental long-stalked leaves and downy white flowers with yellow and brown sterile stamens. It produces a fiber of very fine texture, known as African hemp, and recommended for its strength and beautiful silver-gray color.

sparoid (spā'roid), a. and n. [< NL. Sparus + -oid.] I. a. Resembling a sea-bream; of or pertaining to the Sparidæ in a bread sense. Also sparidal.—Sparoid scales, scales characteristic of sparoid fishes—thin, wide, with lines of growth proceeding from their hind border. Agassiz.

II. n. A sparoid fish.

Sparoidæ (spạ-roi'dē), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Sparidæ.

sparple† (spär'pl), v. t. [Also sparble; < ME. sparplen, sparpyllen, < OF. esparpeiller, F. éparpiller, scatter, fly off like a butterfly, = Pr. esparpillar = It. sparpagliare, scatter, fly off like a butterfly. Cf. disparple.] To scatter; spread abroad; disperse.

> Thei made the renges to sparble a-brode.
> Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 396.

sparret, n. and v. An obsolete form of spar[1].

sparrer (spär'ėr), n. One who spars; one who practises boxing. Thackeray, Adventures of Philip, vii.

sparrow (spar'ō), n. [< ME. sparowe, sparuwe, sparewe, sparwe, < AS. spearwa, spearewa, in early glosses spearua, = OHG. sparo (sparw-), sparwe, MHG. spar (MHG. dim. sperline, sperling) = Icel. spörr = Sw. sparf = Dan. spurv = Goth. sparwa, a sparrow; prob. from the root of spur, spurn, 'kick, quiver': see spur. Cf. MD. sparwer, sperwer, D. sperwer = MLG. sparwer, sperwer = OHG. sparwari, sparwāri, MHG. sperwære, sparwære, G. sperber (cf. It. sparriere, sparaviere = Pr. esparvier = OF. espervier, F. épervier, in ML. sparrarius, sparaverius, esparrarius, < OHG., cf. Sp. espararán), a sparrow-hawk, lit. 'sparrow-eagle,' the second element being OHG. aro (in comp. -ari), eagle: see earn[3]. Cf. sparver, sparin.] 1. The house-sparrow, Passer domesticus, a fringilline bird of Europe, which has been imported and naturalized in America, Australia, and other countries. It is about 6 inches long and 9¼ in extent of wings. The upper parts of the male are ashy-gray, boldly streaked on the back with black and bay; there is a dark-chestnut or mahogany spot on each side of the neck; the lesser wing-coverts are chestnut; the median are tipped with white, forming a wing-bar; the greater coverts and inner secondaries have a black field bordered with gray; and the lower parts are ashy or gray, with jet-black on the throat, spreading on the breast, and bordered on the side of the neck with white. The female is similar, but more plainly feathered, lacking the distinctive head-markings of the male. The sparrow is a conirostral granivorous bird, whose food is principally seeds and grain, yet it has been introduced in many countries for the purpose of destroying noxious insects. It is extremely hardy, pugnacious, and prolific, rearing several large broods annually. Of all birds the sparrow naturally attaches itself most closely to man, and easily modifies its habits to suit artificial conditions of environment. It is thus one of several animals, as rats, mice, and other vermin, well fitted to survive under whatever conditions man may offer or enforce; hence it wins in competition with the native birds of the foreign countries where it naturalizes, without as readily developing counteractive agencies to check its increase. It speedily becomes a pest wherever introduced, and seldom destroys noxious insects to any appreciable extent. It was brought into the United States from Germany about 1869, and is now probably more numerous than any single native bird. In New York city thousands of sparrows are sold and eaten as reed-birds. See cut under Passer[2].

2. Some or any fringilline bird resembling the sparrow, as Passer montanus, the tree-sparrow; one of various finches and buntings, mostly of plain coloration. In the United States the name is given, with a qualifying word, to very many small sparrow-like birds, mostly of homely streaked coloration. Chipping- or field-sparrows belong to the genus Spizella; crown-sparrows to Zonotrichia; fox-sparrows to Passerella; grasshopper-sparrows to Coturniculus; the grass-sparrow to Poœcetes; the lark-sparrow to Chondestes; sage-sparrows to Amphispiza; savanna-sparrows to Passerculus; seaside sparrows to Ammodromus; snow-sparrows to Junco; song-sparrows to Melospiza. See cuts under Chondestes, Coturniculus, Embernagra, field-sparrow, grassfinch, sage-sparrow, savanna-sparrow, snowbird, and song-sparrow.

3. Some little bird likened to or mistaken for a sparrow. Thus, the hedge-sparrow is the hedge-chanter, Accentor modularis, and some other warblers are loosely called sparrows.—Bush-sparrow, the hedge-sparrow, Accentor modularis.—English sparrow, the common European house-sparrow, Passer domesticus: so called in the United States. See def. 1. — Green-tailed sparrow, Blanding's finch. See finch[1].— Java sparrow, the rice-bird of Java, Amadina (Munia or Padda) oryzivora, about as large as the bobolink, of a bluish-gray color with pink bill and white ear-coverts: a well-known cage-bird. — Sandwich sparrow, a variety of the common savanna-sparrow found in Alaska. — White-throated sparrow, a crown-sparrow. (See also field-sparrow, hedge-sparrow, hill-sparrow, house-sparrow, reed-sparrow, satin-sparrow, water-sparrow, and other compounds noted in def. 2.)

sparrow-bill (spar'ō-bil), n. 1. The bill of a sparrow.—2. A kind of shoe-nail: the original form of sparable.

> Hob-nailes to serve the man i' th' moone,
> And sparrowbils to cloute Pan's shoone.
> Dekker, Londons Tempe.

sparrowblet (spar'ō-bl), n. Same as sparrow-bill, 2, sparable.

sparrow-grass (spar'ō-gràs), n. [A corruption, simulating sparrow + grass, of sparagrass, itself a corruption of sparagus for asparagus.] Asparagus. [Prov. or vulgar.]—French sparrow-grass, the sprouts of the spiked star-of-Bethlehem, Ornithogalum Pyrenaicum, sold to be eaten as asparagus. Prior, Popular Names of British Plants. [Prov. Eng.]

sparrow-hawk (spar'ō-hâk), n. [Also contr. sparhawk; < ME. spar-hauk, sperhauk, < AS. spearhafoc, spearhabue, spærhabue (= Icel. sparrhaukr = Sw. sparfhök = Dan. spurvehög), < spearwa, sparrow, + hafoc, hawk: see sparrow and hawk[1]. For the D., G., and Rom. names for 'sparrow-hawk,' see under sparrow.] 1. One of several small hawks which prey on sparrows and other small birds. (a) A hawk of the genus Accipiter or Nisus. In Great Britain the name is appropriated to A. nisus, or Nisus fringillarius, about 12 inches long, closely related to the sharp-shinned hawk of America. (b) In the United States, a hawk of the genus Falco and subgenus Tinnunculus, especially F. (T.) sparverius, which abounds in nearly all parts of the country, and is known in books as the rusty-crowned falcon and prairie-hawk. It is 10 or 11 inches long, and from 20 to 23 in extent of wings. The adult is ashy-blue on the crown, with a chestnut spot; on the back cinnamon-rufous, the male having few black marks or none, and the female numerous black bars. The wing-coverts in the male are ashy-blue, usually spotted with black; in the female cinnamon barred with black. The tail is bright-chestnut, in the male with a broad subterminal black band, and the outer feathers mostly white with black bars; in the female barred throughout with black. The under parts are white, variously tinted with buff or tawny, in the male with few black spots if any; in the female with many dark-brown stripes. The bill is dark horn-blue; the cere and feet are yellow or orange. It is an elegant and spirited falcon, breeding in hollows of trees, building no nest, but often taking possession of a woodpecker's hole. The female lays five, six, or seven subspheroidal eggs, 1¼ inches long by 1 1/16 inches broad, of a buffy or pale-yellowish ground-color, spotted and splashed all over with dark brown. Several similar sparrow-hawks inhabit America, and various other species, of both the genera named, are found in most parts of the world.

European Sparrow-hawk (Accipiter nisus).

American Sparrow-hawk (Falco sparverius), adult male.

2. In silver-working, a small anvil with two horns (one flat-sided and pyramidal, the other conical in form), held between the knees of the workman, for use in flanging, making bezels, etc.

sparrow-owl (spar'ō-oul), n. Any one of many small owls of the genus Glaucidium. Two occur in western parts of the United States, G. gnoma, the gnome-owl, and G. ferrugineum. See cut under Glaucidium.

sparrow-tail (spar'ō-tāl), n. and a. I. n. Something formed like a sparrow's tail; a swallow-tail.

These long-tailed coats [in 1786] . . . were cut away in front to a sparrow-tail behind. Fairholt, Costume, I. 401.

II. a. Having a long skirt cut away at the sides and squared off at the end: as, a sparrow-tail coat (now usually called swallow-tail).

The lawyers in their blue sparrow-tail coats with brass buttons, which constituted then [about 1840] a kind of professional uniform, moved about with as much animation as uneasy jay-birds. E. Eggleston, The Graysons, xxvi.

sparrow-tongue† (spar'ō-tung), n. The knot-grass, Polygonum aviculare.

sparrowwort (spar'ō-wėrt), n. 1. Any plant of the genus Passerina.—2. A South African species of heath, Erica Passerinæ.

sparry (spär'i), a. [< spar[2] + -y[1].] Resembling spar; consisting of or abounding with spar; spathose.

As the rude cavern's sparry sides
When past the miner's taper glides. J. Baillie.

The rock . . . is a sparry iron ore, which turns reddish brown on exposure to the weather.
J. Croll, Climate and Time, p. 308.

Sparry iron, sparry iron ore, a carbonate of iron: same as siderite, 2. The clay-ironstones, or the clay-bands and black-bands of the coal and other formations, belong to this family of iron ores.

sparsate (spär'sāt), a. [< sparse + -ate[1].] In entom., thinly scattered; sparse: as, sparsate punctures. [Rare.]

sparse (spärs), a. [< OF. espars, F. épars = Pg. esparso, scattered, < L. sparsus, pp. of spargere, scatter, sprinkle (> It. spargere = Sp. esparcir = Pg. espargir, scatter): see sparge. Cf. sparse, v., sperse, disperse.] 1. Thinly scattered; dispersed round about; existing at considerable intervals; as used of population or the like, not dense. [Sparse has been regarded, falsely, as an Americanism, and has been objected to as being exactly equivalent to scattered, and therefore unnecessary. As a merely qualifying adjective, however, it is free from the possible ambiguity inherent in the participial form and consequent verbal implication of scattered.]

A sparse remnant of yellow leaves falling slowly athwart the dark evergreens. George Eliot, Middlemarch, ix.

The sparse populations of new districts.
Sir C. W. Dilke, Probs. of Greater Britain, ii. 1.

Halley . . . was one of the first to discuss the possible luminosity of sparse masses of matter in space.
Nineteenth Century, XXVI. 788.

2. In bot., scattered; placed distantly or irregularly without any apparent or regular order: applied to branches, leaves, peduncles, etc.—3. In zoöl., spare or remote, as spots or other markings; scattered irregularly; few or scanty, as hairs or other appendages.

sparse† (spärs), v. t. [< OF. esparser, esparcer, < L. sparsus, pp. of spargere, scatter: see sparse, a. Cf. sperse, disperse, sparge.] To disperse; scatter.

As when the hollow flood of aire in Zephires checks doth swell,
And sparseth all the gathered clouds.
Chapman, Iliad, xi. 268.

He [God] opens his hand wide, he sparseth abroad his blessings, and fills all things living with his plenteousness. Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 418.

sparsedly† (spär'sed-li), adv. In a scattered manner; dispersedly; sparsely. Imp. Dict.

sparsely (spärs'li), adv. 1. In a scattered or sparse manner; scantily; widely apart, as regards population, etc.; thinly.

The country between Trinity river and the Mississippi is sparsely settled, containing less than one inhabitant to the square mile. Olmsted, Texas, p. 365.

2. In bot. and zoöl., so as to be sparse, thin, few, or scanty; sparely or sparingly. See sparse, a., 2, 3.

sparseness (spärs'nes), n. The state of being sparse; scattered condition; wide separation: as, sparseness of population.

The sparseness of the wires in the magnet coils and the use of the single cup battery were to me . . . obvious marks of defect. The Century, XXXV. 931.

sparsile (spär'sil), a. [< LL. sparsilis, < L. sparsus, pp. of spargere, scatter: see sparse.] Scattered; sparse.—Sparsile star, in astron., a star not included in a constellation-figure.

sparsity (spär'si-ti), n. [< sparse + -ity.] The state of being sparse or scattered about; freedom from closeness or compactness; relative fewness.

At receptions where the sparsity of the company permits the lady of the house to be seen, she is commonly visible on a sofa, surrounded by visitors in a half-circle.
Howells, Venetian Life, xxi.

spart (spärt), n. [= F. sparte = Sp. Pg. esparto = It. sparto, < L. spartum, < Gr. σπάρτον, Spanish broom; a particular use of σπάρτον, a rope, cable; cf. σπάρτη, a rope. Cf. esparto.] 1†. A plant of the broom kind; broom.

The nature of spart or Spanish broome.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, bk. xix. (Davies.)

2. A rush, Juncus articulatus, and other species. [Prov. Eng.]

spartaite (spär'tā-īt), n. [< Sparta (see def.) + -ite[2].] A variety of calcite or calcium carbonate, containing some manganese. It is found in Sparta, Sterling Hill, New Jersey.

Spartan (spär'tan), a. and n. [< L. Spartanus, < Sparta, < Gr. Σπάρτη, Sparta, Lacedæmon.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to Sparta or Lacedæmon, the capital of Laconia, or the ancient kingdom of Sparta or Lacedæmon (Laconia), in the Peloponnesus; Lacedæmonian; specifically, belonging to the branch of the ancient Dorian race dominant in Laconia.—2. Noting characteristics distinctive of, or considered as distinctive of, the ancient Spartans.

Lycurgus . . . sent the Poet Thales from Creet to prepare and mollifie the Spartan surlinesse with his smooth songs and odes, the better to plant among them law and civility. Milton, Areopagitica.

Spartan dog, a bloodhound; hence, a cruel or bloodthirsty person.

O Spartan dog,
More fell than anguish, hunger, or the sea!
Shak., Othello, v. 2. 361.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Sparta or Laconia; a Lacedæmonian; specifically (as opposed to Lacedæmonian in a narrower sense), a member of that branch of the ancient Dorian race which conquered Laconia and established the kingdom of Sparta, celebrated for its military success and prestige, due to the rigid discipline enforced upon all Spartans from early childhood; a Spartiate.

Spartanism (spär'tan-izm), n. [< Spartan + -ism.] The distinguishing spirit or a characteristic practice or quality of the ancient Spartans. See Spartan.

sparteine (spär'tē-in), n. [< Spart(ium) + -e- + -ine.] A liquid alkaloid ($C_{15}H_{26}N_2$) obtained from the common broom, Cytisus (Spartium) scoparius. In small doses (.02 to .05 gram) it stimulates the action of the vagus, and is used medicinally in the form of the sulphate in place of digitalis; it acts more quickly than the latter drug, but not as powerfully.

sparterie (spär'tėr-i), n. [< F. sparterie, < Sp. esparteria, < esparto, Spanish grass, broom: see esparto, spart.] In com., a collective name for articles manufactured from esparto and its fiber, as mats, nets, cordage, and ropes.

spart-grass (spärt'gràs), n. Same as spart, 2; also, a cord-grass, Spartina stricta. Britten and Holland, Eng. Plant Names.

sparth†, n. [< ME. sparth, sparthe, sperthe, an ax, a battle-ax, < Icel. spartha, a kind of Irish ax; perhaps akin to spear.] A battle-ax, or perhaps in some cases a mace.

tte hath a sparth of twenti pound of wighte.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1662.

At his saddle-gerthe was a good steel sperthe,
Full ten pound weight and more.
Scott, Eve of St. John.

Spartiate (spär'ti-āt), n. [F., < L. Spartiates, < Gr. Σπαρτιάτης, a Spartan, < Σπάρτη, Sparta: see Spartan.] A citizen of Sparta; an ancient Laconian of the Dorian race. See Spartan.

Aristotle recognizes only one thousand families of the ancient Spartiates; and their landed possessions, the very groundwork of their state and its discipline, had in great measure passed into the hands of women.
Von Ranke, Univ. Hist. (trans.), p. 360.

Spartina (spär'ti-nä), n. [NL. (Von Schreber, 1789), so called from the tough leaves; < Gr. σπαρτίνη, a cord, < σπάρτη, σπάρτον, a rope or cord.] A genus of grasses, of the tribe Paniceæ. It is characterized by flowers with three glumes and a thread-shaped two-cleft style, grouped in dense one-sided commonly numerous and divergent panicled spikes with the rachis prolonged beyond the uppermost spikelet. There are 7 species, natives mostly of salt-marshes; one, S. stricta, is widely dispersed along the shores of America, Europe, and Africa; four others are found in the United States, one in South America beyond the tropics, and one in the islands of Tristan da Cunha, St. Paul, and Amsterdam. They are rigid reed-like grasses rising from a tufted or creeping base, with scaly rootstocks, very smooth sheaths, and long convolute leaves sometimes flattened at the base. Book-names for the species are marsh-grass, cord-grass, and salt-grass; four of them are among the most conspicuous maritime grasses of the United States. S. polystachya, the largest species, a stately plant with a broad stiff panicle often of fifty spikes, is known locally on the coast as creek-thatch and creek-stuff, from its growth in creeks or inlets of salt water, and from its use, when cut, as a cover for stacks of salt-hay and as bedding in stables. (See also salt reed-grass, under reed-grass.) S. cynosuroides is the cord-grass of fresh-water lakes and rivers, smaller, attaining a height of about 6 feet; it occurs from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and in great quantities along the Mississippi; a superior brown wrapping-paper has been made from it. S. juncea, a low turf-forming species with diminutive three- to five-forked inflorescence, sometimes called rush salt-grass, covers large tracts of salt-marsh on the Atlantic coast, is recommended for binding wet sands, and yields a tough fiber from its leaves. S. stricta, the salt-marsh grass, with very different inflorescence, bears its numerous branches rigidly appressed into a single long and slender erect spike, or sometimes two, when it is called twin-spike grass. It is said to be also used as a durable thatch; it is succulent and is eagerly eaten by cattle, imparting to their milk, butter, and flesh a strong rancid flavor locally known as a "thatchy" taste.

Spartium (spär'shi-um), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < L. spartum, sparton, < Gr. σπάρτον, Spanish broom: see spart, esparto.] A genus of leguminous plants, of the tribe Genisteæ, type of the subtribe Spartieæ. It is distinguished from the related genus Genista by a somewhat spathaceous calyx with very short teeth, by acuminate and incurved keel-petals, and by a narrower pod. The only species, S. junceum, is a native of the Mediterranean region and of the Canary Islands, known as Spanish broom, now naturalized in various parts of tropical America and long cultivated in gardens. It is a shrub with numerous long, straight, rush-like branches, which are green, polished, and round—not angular like the similar branches of the Irish broom. They are commonly without leaves; when these are present, they are composed each of a single leaflet and are without stipules. The handsome pea-like flowers form terminal racemes; they are yellow, fragrant, and highly attractive to bees, and are the source of a yellow dye. The branches are used to make baskets and fasten vines in vineyards; they yield by maceration a fiber which is made into cord and thread, and in Italy and Spain into cloth. The seeds in small doses are diuretic and tonic; in large, emetic and cathartic.

sparto† (spär'tō), n. Same as esparto.

spar-torpedo (spär'tôr-pē″dō), n. A torpedo secured to the end of a spar, rigged outboard of a vessel, and arranged to be fired on coming into contact with another vessel. Sometimes called pole-torpedo.

Sparus (spā'rus), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1766), < L. sparus, < Gr. σπάρος, a kind of fish, the gilthead.] 1. The name-giving genus of Sparidæ, whose longest-known representative is the gilthead of Europe: used at first in a very comprehensive sense, embracing many heterogeneous species belonging to a number of modern families, but now restricted to the gilthead and very closely related species, typical of the family Sparidæ. See cut under porgy.—2. [l. c.] A fish of this or some related genus; a spar.

sparve (spärv), n. [A dial. form of sparrow, ult. < AS. spearwa: see sparrow.] A sparrow: still locally applied to the hedge-sparrow, Accentor modularis. [Cornwall, Eng.]

sparver† (spär'vėr), n. [Also esparrer; early mod. E. also sparrier, sparriour, sperver, sparvill; < OF. esperrier, esprerier, the furniture of a bed; perhaps a transferred use of esparrier, esperrier, a sweep-net, which is a fig. use of esperrier, a sparrow-hawk: see sparrow, and cf. parilion, ult. < L. papilio(n-), a butterfly.] 1. The canopy of a bed, or the canopy and curtains taken together.

I will that my . . . daughter have the sparver of my bedde. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, App. A.

2. In her., a tent.

sparviour†, n. Same as sparrer.

sparwe†, n. A Middle English form of sparrow.

spary† (spār'i), a. [< spare[1] + -y[1].] Sparing.

Homer, being otherwise sparie ynough in speaking of pictures and colours, yet commendeth the ships painted therwith. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxxiii. 7.

spasm (spazm), n. [Early mod. E. spasme; < F. spasme = Pr. espasme = Sp. Pg. espasmo = It. spasimo, spasmo, < L. spasmus, < Gr. σπασμός, also σπάσμα, a spasm, < σπᾶν, draw, pull, pluck, tear, rend. Cf. span[1], spaec, from the same ult. root.] 1. Excessive muscular contraction. When this is persistent, it is called tonic spasm; when it consists of alternating contractions and relaxations, it is called clonic spasm. A spasm of one side of the body is called hemispasm; a spasm of some particular part, as one arm, or one side of the face, is called a monospasm.

2. In general, any sudden transitory movement of a convulsive character, voluntary or involuntary; an abnormally energetic action or phase of feeling; a wrenching strain or effort:

as, a spasm of industry, of grief, of fright, etc.; a spasm of pain or of coughing.

The spasms of Nature are centuries and ages, and will tax the faith of short-lived men. Slowly, slowly the Avenger comes, but comes surely. Emerson, Fugitive Slave Law.

Bronchial spasm, the spasmodic contraction of the muscular coat of the bronchial tubes which is the essential element of asthma.—Carpopsdal, clonic, cynic, histrionic spasm. See the adjectives.—Functional spasm, a general term for the nervous disorders of artisans and writers, as writers' cramp, etc. Usually called occupation neurosis.—Habit spasm, a trick of winking, jerking the head, sudden brief grinning, making a sudden short vocal noise, running out the tongue, and similar acts of half-voluntary aspect, occurring at intervals long or short. Also called habit chorea.—Inspiratory spasm, a spasmodic contraction of all or nearly all the inspiratory muscles.—Mobile spasm, tonic spasm of varying intensity in the various muscles of a part, causing slow, irregular movements of the part, especially conspicuous in the hands. Sometimes the movements are quick. In rare cases it comes on without preceding hemiplegia; it may then, as in other cases, be called athetosis. Also called, when following hemiplegia, spastic hemiplegia and post-hemiplegic chorea.—Nictitating spasm. See nictitate.—Nodding spasm. Same as salaam convulsion (which see, under salaam).—Retrocollic spasm. See retrocollic.—Saltatorial spasm, a form of clonic spasm of the legs, coming on when the patient attempts to walk, causing jumping movements.—Spasm of accommodation, spasm of the ciliary muscle, producing accommodation for near objects.—Spasm of the chest, angina pectoris.—Spasm of the glottis, spasmodic contraction of the laryngeal muscles such as to close the glottis. See child-crowing, and laryngismus stridulus (under laryngismus).—Tetanic spasm. Same as tonic spasm.

spasmatic (spaz-mat'ik), a. [= F. spasmatique = Sp. espasmático, < ML. spasmaticus, < Gr. σπάσμα(τ-), a spasm: see spasm.] Same as spasmodic.

spasmatical (spaz-mat'i-kal), a. [< spasmatic + -al.] Same as spasmodic.

The Ligaments and Sinews of my Love to you have been so strong that they were never yet subject to such spasmaticol Shrinkings and Convulsions.
Howell, Letters, ii. 20.

spasmatomancy (spaz'mä-tō-man-si), n. [< Gr. σπάσμα(τ-), a spasm, + μαντεία, divination.] Divination from spasmodic or involuntary movements, as of the muscles, features, or limbs.

The treatises [on physiognomy] also contain occasional digressions on onychomancy, . . . spasmatomancy, etc.
Encyc. Brit., XIX. 4.

spasmodic (spaz-mod'ik), a. and n. [= F. spasmodique = Sp. espasmódica = Pg. espasmadico = It. spasmadico, < NL. spasmodicus*, < Gr. σπασμώδης, σπασματώδης, convulsive. spasmodic, < σπασμός, σπάσμα(τ-), a spasm, + εἶδος, form.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to, of the nature of, or characterized by spasm; affected by spasm or spasms; convulsive: as, spasmodic movements; spasmodic asthma; a spasmadic person.—2. Attended by or manifesting procedure by fits and starts; jerky; overstrained; high-strung; rhapsodical: as, spasmodic action or efforts; spasmodic utterance or literature.—Spasmodic asthma, true asthma caused by spasm of the bronchial tubes, as distinguished from other forms of paroxysmal dyspnœa, as from heart disease.—Spasmodic cholera, Asiatic cholera with severe cramps.—Spasmodic croup. See croup[1].—Spasmodic school, a group of British authors of the middle of the nineteenth century, including Philip Bailey, George Gilfillan, and Alexander Smith, whose writings were considered to be distinguished by an overstrained and unnatural style. The name, however, properly has a much more extensive scope, being exemplified more or less in nearly all times and countries, both in literature and in art.

The so-called spasmodic school of poetry, whose peculiarities first gained for it a hasty reputation, and then, having suffered under closer critical examination, it almost as speedily dropped out of mind again.
Encyc. Brit., XXII. 172.

Spasmodic stricture, a stricture, as of the urethra, vagina, or rectum, caused by spasmodic muscular contraction, and not permanent, or involving any organic lesion.—Spasmodic tabes, spastic paraplegia, or lateral sclerosis.

II. n. Same as antispasmodic. [Rare.]

spasmodical (spaz-mod'i-kal), a. [< spasmadic + -al.] Same as spasmodic.

spasmodically (spaz-mod'i-kal-i), adv. In a spasmodic manner; by fits and starts; by spasmodic action or procedure.

Gradual oscillations of the land are, in the long run, of far greater importance in the economy of nature than those abrupt movements which occur spasmodically.
Huxley, Physiography, p. 205.

spasmodist (spaz'mō-dist), n. [< spasmad-ic + -ist.] One who acts spasmodically; a person whose work is of a spasmodic character, or marked by an overstrained and unnatural manner. [Rare.]

De Meyer and the rest of the spasmodists [in music].
Poe, Marginalia, xxxvii. (Davies.)

spasmology (spas-mol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. σπασμός, a spasm, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] In pathol., scientific knowledge of spasms.

spasmotoxin (spas-mō-tok'sin), n. [< Gr. σπασμός, a spasm, + E. toxin.] A toxin of unknown composition, obtained by Brieger in 1887 from cultures of bacillus tetani.

spasmus (spas'mus), n. [L.: see spasm.] Spasm.—Spasmus nutans. Same as salaam convulsion (which see, under salaam).

spastic (spas'tik), a. [< Gr. σπαστικός, drawing, pulling, stretching, < σπᾶν, draw, pull: see spasm.] 1. In med., pertaining or relating to spasm; spasmodic: as, spastic contractions; spastic remedies.—2. In zoöl., convulsive, as an infusorian; of or pertaining to the Spastica.—Spastic albuminuria, albuminuria dependent upon a convulsive attack.—Spastic anemia, local anemia or ischemia from spastic contraction of the arteries of the part.—Spastic hemiplegia, mobile spasm following hemiplegia. See under spasm.—Spastic infantile paralysis. See paralysis.—Spastic paralysis, paralysis with muscular rigidity and increase of reflexes.—Spastic spinal paralysis, spastic pseudoparalysis, spastic pseudoparesis. See paralysis.

Spastica (spas'ti-kä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σπαστικός, drawing, pulling, stretching: see spastic.] In Perty's system of classification, a division of ciliate infusorians, containing those which contract and change form with a jerk. There were 4 families—Urcolarina, Ophrydina, Vorticellina, and Vaginifera.

spastically (spas'ti-kal-i), adv. In a spastic manner.

spasticity (spas-tis'i-ti), n. [< spastic + -ity.] 1. A state of spasm.—2. Tendency to or capability of suffering spasm.

spat[1] (spat), n. [A var. of spot.] A spot; stain; place. [Scotch.]

spat[1] (spat), v. t.; pret. and pp. spatted, ppr. spatting. [A var. of spot, prob. in part < D. spatten, spot: see spot. Cf. spatter.] To spatter; defile.

Thy mind is spotted, spatted, spilt;
Thy soule is soyld with sinne.
Kendall, Flowers of Epigrammes (1577). (Nares.)

spat[2] (spat), n. [Prob., like the similar D. spat, a speck, spot, = Sw. spott, spittle, etc. (see spot), from the root of spit[2] (cf. spat[1]): see spit[2].] The spawn of shell-fish; specifically, the spawn of the oyster; also, a young oyster, or young oysters collectively, up to about the time of their becoming set, or fixed to some support. See spawn, n., 2.

Oyster spat may be reared from artificially fertilized eggs.
The American, VII. 75.

spat[2] (spat), v.; pret. and pp. spatted, ppr. spatting. [< spat[2], n.] I. intrans. To spawn, as an oyster; shed spat.

The surfaces upon which spatting occurs must be kept as free as possible from sediment and organic growths.
Science, VI. 465.

II. trans. To shed or emit (spawn), as an oyster.

spat[3] (spat), n. [In the sense 'blow' (def. 1), cf. spot; in part prob. imitative, like pat.] 1. A light blow or slap. [Local.]—2. A large drop; a spatter: as, two or three spats of rain fell.—3. A petty contest; a little quarrel or dissension. [U. S.]

N. Macleod, The Starling, iii.

Spatangida (spā-tan'ji-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Spatangus + -ida.] The spatangoid sea-urchins, as distinguished from Clypeastrida. See Spatangoida.

Spatangidæ (spā-tan'ji-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spatangus + -idæ.] A family of irregular sea-urchins, typified by the genus Spatangus; the heart-urchins. The mouth is eccentric, transverse, or reniform, and without dentary apparatus; there are petaloid ambulacra, of which the anterior one is unpaired; semitæ or fascioles are always present; and the figure is oval or cordate. This is the leading family of the order, divided mainly by the characters of the ambulacra and semitæ into several subfamilies (some of which rank as separate families with some authors), as Ananchytinæ, Brissinæ, Lesskiinæ, and others. See cuts under Spatangoida and Spatangus, with others there noted. Also called Brissidæ.

Spatangina (spat-an-jī'nä), n. pl. [NL., < Spatangus + -ina[2].] 1. The spatangoid sea-urchins, as an order of petalostichous echinoids contrasted with Clypeastrina.—2. Same as Spatanginæ.

Spatanginæ (spat-an-jī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Spatangus + -inæ.] One of several subfamilies of Spatangidæ, including the genus Spatangus and closely related forms, as Lovenia, Breynia, etc.

spatangite (spā-tan'jīt), n. [< Spatangus + -ite[2].] A fossil spatangoid. See Dysasteridæ, and cut under Ananchytes.

spatangoid (spā-tang'goid), a. and n. [< Spatangus + -oid.] I. a. Resembling a heart-urchin; related to Spatangus; of or pertaining to the Spatangidæ in a broad sense.

II. n. A spatangoid sea-urchin; a heart-urchin.

Spatangoida, Spatangoidea (spat-ang-goi'dä, -dē-ä), n. pl. [NL.: see spatangoid.] The Spatangidæ, in a broad sense, as an order of petalostichous sea-urchins: synonymous in some uses with Petalosticha, but usually restricted to exclude the clypeastroids or flat sea-urchins: then also called Spatangida and Spatangina. The forms are numerous; most of them fall in the family Spatangidæ as usually limited, from which the Cassidulidæ are distinguished by the absence of semitæ and other approaches to the regular sea-urchins. The form of the spatangoids is various, and only a part of them have a cordate figure. Some are quite elongate, and may even bear a sort of beak or rostrum, as in the genus Pourtalesia. The tendency is away from radiism and toward a sort of bilateral symmetry, as evidenced by the disposition of five ambulacra in two groups, an anterior trivium—under the odd ambulacrum of which is the mouth—and a posterior bivium, in relation with which is the anus. The odd anterior ambulacrum often aborts, leaving apparently but four ambulacra on the upper surface; in other cases it is disproportionally enlarged. The ambulacra are always petaloid; semitæ are not recognized outside this group, and occur nearly throughout it (but not in Cassidulidæ and the fossil Dysasteridæ); the spines are very variable, and few or many, but always slender or fine, sometimes like hairs of great length. The genital and ocular plates are centric; there are no Polian vesicles, and four kinds of pedicels or tube-feet occur, of which the semital are always different from the two or three kinds of ambulacral feet. See cuts under Ananchytes, Echinocardium, petalostichous, semita, and Spatangus.

Amphidotus cordatus (or Echinocardium cordatum), one of the Spatangoida, viewed from above.
a, anterior ambulacrum, forming with b, b, anterolateral ambulacra, the trivium; c, c, two posterolateral ambulacra, forming the bivium; d, madreporic tubercle surrounded by genital pores; e, intrapetalous semita or fasciole; f, circumanal semita.

Spatangus (spā-tang'gus), n. [NL., < Gr. σπατάγγης, a sea-urchin.] 1. The representative genus of the family Spatangidæ, and a type form of the irregular sea-urchins called Spatangoida.—2. [l. c.] A species of this genus: as, the violet spatangus, S. purpureus.

Violet Spatangus (S. purpureus). One half shown with its spines removed.

spatch-cock (spach'kok), n. [Usually supposed to stand for despatch-cock*, meaning 'a cock quickly done'; but such a formation is irregular, and no record of it exists. There is prob. some confusion with spitchcock, q. v.] A fowl killed and immediately broiled, as for some sudden occasion. [Colloq., Eng.]

spate (spāt), n. [Also spait, speat; appar. < Ir. speid, a great river-flood.] A natural outpour of water; a flood; specifically, a sudden flood or freshet, as from a swollen river or lake. [Originally Scotch.]

Down the water wi' speed she rins,
While tears in spaits fa' fast frae her eie.
Jock o' the Side (Child's Ballads, VI. 82).

Mr. Scrope held that whole spawning-beds are swept away by spates on the Tweed.
Quarterly Rev., CXXVI. 361.

The Avon . . . running yellow in spate, with the recent heavy rains.
W. Black, House-boat, xix.

spate-bone†, n. Same as spade-bone.

Some afterwards set up on a window a painted Mastiff-dog gnawing the spate-bone of a shoulder of mutton.
Fuller, Ch. Hist., V. i. 32. (Davies.)

spatha (spā′thạ), n.; pl. spathæ (-thē). [< L. spatha, < Gr. σπάθη, a broad flat blade, a broadsword: see spathe.] 1. A broadsword, thin, pointed, and double-edged, such as was used by the Franks and kindred peoples.

The British swords, called spathæ, were large, long, and heavy. Encyc. Brit., IX. 69.

2. In bot., same as spathe.

spathaceous (spā-thā′shius), a. [< spathe + -aceous.] In bot., spathe-bearing; furnished with or of the nature of a spathe.

spathal (spā′thạl), a. [< spathe. + -al.] In bot., inclosed in or furnished with a spathe: as, spathal flowers.

spathe (spāᴛʜ), n. [< L. spatha, < Gr. σπάθη, a broad flat blade, a broadsword, a broad rib, the shoulder-blade, the stem of a leaf, the spathe of a flower, a spatula. Hence ult. (< Gr.) E. spade[1], spade[2], spatula, spatule, spattle[2], spaddle, spittle[3], etc.] 1. In bot., a peculiar often large and colored bract, or pair of bracts, which subtend or envelop a spadix, as in palms and arums. The name is also given to the peculiar several-leafed involucre of iris and allied plants. See spadix, 1, and cuts under Araceæ, Indian turnip (under Indian), Monstera, Peltandra, and Symplocarpus. 2. In zoöl., some spatulate or spoon-shaped part.

spathed (spāᴛʜd), a. [< spathe + -ed[2].] In bot., surrounded or furnished with a spathe; spathaceous.

Spathegaster (spath-ē-gas′tėr), n. [NL. (Hartig, 1840), < Gr. σπάθη, a blade, + γαστήρ, the stomach.] 1. A spurious genus of hymenopterous gall-insects, containing dimorphic forms of Neuroterus, the name being retained as distinctive of such forms.—2. A genus of syrphid flies. Schiner, 1868. Also Spatigaster (Schiner, 1862), Spathiogaster (Loew, 1843), Spaziyaster and Spazogaster (Rondani, 1843).

spathegastric (spath-ē-gas′trik), a. [< Spathegaster + -ic.] Pertaining to Spathegaster (sense 1): as, a spathegastric form.

Spathelia (spā-thē′li-ạ), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1752), perhaps so called from its resemblance to a palm-tree; < Gr. σπάθη, a blade, spathe, petiole of a palm-tree: see spathe.] A genus of polypetalous trees, of the order Simarubaceæ and tribe Picramniceæ. It is characterized by polygamous flowers without the disk usually present in the order, five stamens alternate to the petals, and a three-angled ovary with two pendulous ovules in each of its three cells. There are 3 species, natives of the West Indies, extending perhaps into Mexico. They are lofty and handsome trees with an erect unbranched trunk, destitute of the bitter principle which pervades Picramnia, the next related genus, and many others of the order, and in many respects, as in the ovary, resembling Boswellia, the frankincense-tree, of the order Burseraceæ. They bear odd-pinnate alternate leaves, composed of numerous linear-oblong or sickle-shaped leaflets with a toothed or gland-bearing margin, and cymose clusters of red short-pedicelled flowers, disposed in elongated terminal panicles. The fruit is a somewhat elliptical three-angled and three-winged drupe, with a three-celled and three-seeded stone perforated with resin-bearing canals. S. simplex is the mountain-pride or mountain-green of the West Indies, a handsome tree with slender trunk rising from 20 to 50 feet, its leaves and its powdery inflorescence each several feet long.

spathic (spath′ik), a. [< G. spath, spar (see spaad), + -ic.] In mineral., having an even lamellar or flatly foliated structure.—Spathic iron, spathic iron ore, carbonate of iron: same as siderite, 2.

spathiform (spath′i-fôrm), a. [< G. spath, spar, + L. forma, form.] Resembling spar in form: as, the ocherous and spathiform varieties of uranite.

spathilla (spā-thil′ạ), n.; pl. spathillæ (-ē). [NL., dim. of spatha, a spathe: see spathe. Cf. spathella.] In bot., a secondary or diminutive spathe in a spathaceous inflorescence, as in palms. Also, sometimes, spathella.

When the spadix is compound or branching, as in Palms, there are smaller spathes, surrounding separate parts of the inflorescence, to which the name spathellæ has sometimes been given. Encyc. Brit., IV. 120.

spathing (spā′ᴛʜing), n. Same as spaying.

spathiopyrite (spath″i-ō-pī′rīt), n. [< Gr. σπάθιον, dim. of σπάθη, a broad blade, + E. pyrite.] Same as safflorite.

spathose[1] (spā′thōs), a. [< spathe + -ose.] In bot., relating to or formed like a spathe; spathaceous; spathal.

spathose[2] (spath′ōs), a. [< G. spath, spar (see spathic), + -ose.] In mineral., sparry; of the nature of spar; occurring in broad plates or lamellæ; foliated in texture.—Spathose iron, spathic iron.

spathous (spā′thus), a. [< spathe + -ous.] In bot., same as spathose[1].

spathulate (spath′ū-lāt), a. Same as spatulate.

Spathulea (spā-thū′lē-ạ), n. Same as Spatula, 3.

Spathura (spā-thū′rạ), n. [NL. (Gould, 1850), < Gr. σπάθη, a blade, + οὐρά, a tail.] A remarkable genus of Trochilidæ, containing hummingbirds with the lateral tail-feathers long-exserted, narrowed, and then dilated into a spatule or racket at the end, and with conspicuous legmuffs. There are 4 or 5 species, as S. underwoodi, also called Steganurus spatuligera.

Racket-tailed Humming-bird (Spathura underwoodi).

spatial (spā′shạl), a. [Also spacial; < L. spatium, space: see space.] Of, pertaining to, or relating to space; existing in or connected with space.

We have an intuition of objects in space: that is, we contemplate objects as made up of spatial parts, and apprehend their spatial relations by the same act by which we apprehend the objects themselves.
Whewell, Philos. of Inductive Sciences, I. p. xx.

The ascertaining of a fixed spatial order among objects supposes that certain objects are at rest or occupy the same position. J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 160.

To analyze the United States of America as a spacial extent. H. N. Day, Logic, p. 175.

spatiality (spā-shi-al′i-ti), n. [Also spaciality; < spatial + -ity.] Spatial character; extension.

So far, all we have established or sought to establish is the existence of the vague form or quale of spatiality as an inseparable element bound up with the other qualitative peculiarities of each and every one of our sensations.
W. James, Mind, XII. 10.

spatially (spā′shạl-i), adv. Having reference to or as regards space. Also written spacially.

Usually we have more trouble to discriminate the quality of an impression than to fix it spatially.
J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 52.

Objects of different sense-organs, experienced together, do not in the first instance appear either inside or alongside or far outside of each other, neither spatially continuous nor discontinuous, in any definite sense of these words. W. James, Prin. of Psychol., II. 181.

spatiate† (spā′shi-āt), v. i. [< L. spatiatus, pp. of spatiari (> G. spazieren), walk about, go, proceed, < spatium, room, space: see space. Cf. expatiate.] To rove; ramble; expatiate.

Confined to a narrow chamber, he could spatiate at large through the whole universe. Bentley.

spatilomancy (spā-til′ō-man-si), n. [< Gr. σπατίλη, exerement, + μαντεία, divination.] Divination by means of animal exerements and refuse.

spatious†, a. An obsolete spelling of spacious.

spatt, n. See spat[5].

spatter (spat′ėr), v. [Freq. of spat[1], or, with variation, of spot: see spat[1], spot.] I. trans. 1. To scatter or threw about carelessly, as some fluid or semi-fluid substance; dash or splash so as to fall in spreading drops or small quantities: as, to spatter water or mud over a person; to spatter oaths or calumnies.

Where famish'd dogs, late guardians of my door,
Shall lick their mangled master's spatter'd gore.
Pope, Iliad, xxii. 97.

2. To dash or splash upon; bespatter, literally or figuratively: as, to spatter a person with water, mud, or slander.

Reynard, close attended at his heels
By panting dog, tir'd man, and spatter'd horse.
Cowper, Needless Alarm, l. 125.

II. intrans. 1†. To sputter; act or talk in a sputtering manner.

The Grave spattered and shook his Head, saying, 'Twas the greatest Error he had committed since he knew what belonged to a Soldier. Howell, Letters, I. iv. 15.

2. To undergo or cause scattering or splashing in drops or small quantities.

The colour spatters in fine drops upon the surface of the buttons. Spons' Encyc. Manuf., I. 562.

spatter (spat′ėr), n. [< spatter, v.] 1. The act of spattering, or the state of being spattered; a spattering or splashing effect.

She . . . sometimes exposed her face to the chill spatter of the wind. Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xvii.

2. A quick succession of not very loud sounds, such as is produced by the spattering of some substance.

A spatter of musketry was heard, which proceeded from the last of the enemy leaving the place.
W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 378.

3. That which is spattered; a small splash, as of something thrown or falling in drops: as, a spatter of milk, ink, or mud on one's clothes.

The sun dripped through
In spatters of wasted gold.
St. Nicholas, XVIII. 987.

spatterdash (spat′ėr-dash), n. [< spatter + dash.] A covering for the legs, used to protect the stockings, trousers, etc., from mud and wear. In modern military uniform the name is applied to several kinds of gaiters, and to the water-proof leggings or shields to the trousers of some French mounted troops. Also splatterdash.

Here 's a fellow made for a soldier: there 's a leg for a spatterdash, with an eye like the king of Prussia.
Sheridan (?), The Camp, l. 2.

spatter-dock (spat′ėr-dok), n. The yellow pond-lily, Nymphæa (Nuphar) advena; also extended to other species of the genus. See Nymphæa[1], 1, and pond-lily, 1. [U. S.]

spatterwork (spat′ėr-wėrk), n. A method of producing a figure or design upon a surface of any kind by spattering coloring matter upon the exposed parts of it; any work or object, or objects collectively, showing an effect so produced.

spattle[1] (spat′i), n. [< ME. spattle, spettle, spatel, spotil, spotele, later spatyll (= OFries. spedel, spedla), < AS. spātl, spittle, < spātan, spit: see spit[2]. Cf. spittle[1].] Spittle. Bp. Bale.

He spette in to erthe, and made clay of the spotle.
Wyclif, John ix. 6.

spattle[2] (spat′l), n. [Formerly also spatule; < OF. spatule, espatule, F. spatule = Sp. espátula = Pg. spatula = It. spatola, < L. spatula, sphathula, a blade, spatula: see spatula. Doublet of spatula, spittle[3].] 1. A flat blade for stirring, mixing, or molding plastic powdered or liquid substances; a spatula.—2. Specifically, in pottery, a tool for mottling a molded article with coloring matter.

spattling-machine (spat′ling-ma-shēn″), n. A machine, consisting of a reservoir with sieves through which the liquid is caused to fall to divide it into spray, for sprinkling a colored glaze to form party-colored ware.

spatula (spat′ū-lạ), n. [< L. spatula, also sphathula, dim. of spatha, < Gr. σπάθη, a broad blade, a spatula, a paddle: see spade[1], spathe. Cf. spatule, spattle[2], spittle[3].] 1. A broad flat blade or strip of metal or wood, with unsharpened edges and a commonly rounded outer end (which may be spoon-shaped), and a handle: used for spreading, smoothing, scraping up, or stirring substances, comminuting powders, etc. Spatulas are usually set in handles like those of table-knives, and are of many shapes, sizes, and materials. Those used by druggists, painters, etc., are comparatively long and narrow, straight, and made of more or less flexible steel. Fresco-painters use a trowel-shaped or spoon-shaped spatula for spreading wax or mortar upon the surface which is to receive the painting.

2. [cap.] [NL. (Boie, 1822).] A genus of Anatinæ, having the bill much longer than the head or tarsus, twice as wide at the end as at the base, there broadly rounded and spoon-shaped, with narrow prominent nail and numerous protrusive lamellæ; the shoveler-ducks or sonchets. The tail is short and pointed, of fourteen feathers. S. clypeata is the common shoveler (see cut under shoveler), S. rhynchotis is Australian, S. platalea is South American, S. capensis is South African, and S. variegata inhabits New Zealand. Also Rhynchaspis, Clypeata, and Spathulea.—Spatula mallei, in anat., the flattened extremity of the handle of the malleus attached to the umbo of the membrana tympani. See cut under tympanic.

spatulamancy (spat′ū-la-man-si), n. [Prop. spatulomancy*, < L. spatula, a blade, + μαντεία, divination.] A method of divination by a sheep's shoulder-blade.

Spatulamancy (called in Scotland Slinneanch [divination]) by reading the speal bone or the blade bone of a shoulder of mutton well scraped.
Ribton-Turner, Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 78.

spatular (spat'ū-lăr), a. [< spatula + -ar[3].] Like a spatula in form; spatulate.

Spatularia (spat-ū-lā'ri-ä), n. [NL. (Shaw), < L. spatula, a spatula: see spatula.] In ichth., Skull of Spatularia, with the long beak removed, the anterior (asc) and posterior (psc) semicircular canals exposed; Au, auditory chamber; Or, orbit of eye; N, nasal sac; Hy, hyoidean apparatus; Br, representatives of branchiostegal rays; Op, operculum; Mn, mandible; A B, suspensorium; D, palatoquadrate cartilage; E, maxilla.

a genus of ganoid fishes: same as Polyodon, 1. See also cut under paddle-fish.

Spatulariidæ (spat*ʺ*ū-lā-ri'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spatularia + -idæ.] In ichth., a family of ganoid fishes, named from the genus Spatularia: same as Polyodontidæ. Also Spatularidæ. See cuts under paddle-fish and Psephurus.

spatulate (spat'ū-lāt), a. [< NL. spatulatus, < spatula, a spatula: see spatula.] Shaped like a spatula; in zoöl. and anat., spoon-shaped, or rounded more or less like the outlines of a spoon; spatuliform; in bot., shaped like a spatula; resembling a spatula in shape, being oblong or rounded with a long narrow attenuate base: as, a spatulate leaf, petal, or other flattened organ. Also spathulate. See cuts under Eurynorhynchus, paddle-fish, Parotia, Prioniturus, Spathura, and shoveler[2].

Spatulate Leaves of Callitriche heterophylla.

The large basal joint of the sixth appendage [of Limulus] is almost devoid of spines, and bears a curved, spatulate process. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 229.

spatulation (spat-ū-lā'shon), n. [< spatulate + -ion.] Spatulate shape or formation; appearance as of a spatula; spoon-shaped figure or arrangement. See cuts noted under spatulate.

The lateral [tail-]feathers [of some humming-birds] may . . . suddenly enlarge into a terminal spatulation, as in the forms known as "Racquet-tails." Encyc. Brit., XII. 359.

spatule (spat'ūl), n. [< F. spatule, < L. spatula, a blade, spatula: see spattle[2], spatula.] 1†. Same as spattle[2].

Stirring it thrice a day with a spatule.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxiii. 17.

2. In zoöl., a spatulate formation or spatuliform part; specifically, in ornith., the racket at the end of the tail-feathers, as of the motmots or sawbills and certain parrakeets and humming-birds. See cuts under Momotus, Prioniturus, and Spathura.

spatuliform (spat'ū-li-fôrm), a. [< L. spatula, a blade, spatula, + forma, form.] Spatulate in form; spoon-shaped.

spatuligerous (spat-ū-lij'e-rus), a. [< L. spatula, a blade, spatula, + gerere, carry.] In zoöl., bearing or provided with a spatule or racket.

spaud, v. A dialectal form of spald[1].

spauder (spâ'dėr), n. [Also spawder (?) (Sc. spelder), also splauder, spread; freq. of spaud, spald: see spald[1].] An injury to animals arising from their legs being forced too far asunder on ice or slippery roads. [Prov. Eng.]

spaul (spâl), n. See spall[2]. — Black spaul. Same as symptomatic anthrax (which see, under anthrax).

spauld†, n. An obsolete variant of spall[2].

spave (spāv), v. t. A dialectal variant of spay[1].

spaviet (spav'i-et), a. A Scotch form of spavined.

My spaviet Pegasus will limp.
Burns, First Epistle to Davie.

spavin (spav'in), n. [Early mod. E. also sparen; < ME. spaveyne, < OF. esparvent, esparvain, F. éparvin = OIt. spavano, It. spavenio = Sp. esparaván = Pg. esparavão, esparvão, spavin; perhaps so called in allusion to the hopping or sparrow-like motion of a horse afflicted with spavin; cf. Sp. esparavár, a sparrow-hawk, < OHG. sparo, sparwe = AS. spearwa = E. sparrow: see sparrow. But this explanation is uncertain, resting on the mere resemblance of form.] 1. A disease of horses affecting the hock-joint, or joint of the hind leg between the knee and the fetlock. See bog-spavin, blood-spavin, bone-spavin. — 2. In coal-mining, the clay underlying the coal. Also called under-clay, coal-clay, seat, seat-clay, etc. [Yorkshire, Eng.]

spavined (spav'ind), a. [< spavin + -ed[2].] Affected with spavin; hence, figuratively, halting; crippled; very lame or limping.

A blind, spavined, galled hack, that was only fit to be cut up for a dog-kennel. Goldsmith, Vicar, xiv.

If they ever praise each other's bad drawings, or broken-winded novels, or spavined verses, nobody ever supposed it was from admiration. O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, i.

spawt†, n. An obsolete form of spa.

spawder, n. See spauder.

spawl[1], n. and v. See spall[1].

spawl[2], n. See spall[2].

spawl[3] (spâl), n. [A contr. of spattle[1].] Saliva or spittle thrown out carelessly; slaver.

The new-born infant from the cradle takes,
And first of spittle she lustration makes;
Then in the spawl her middle finger dips,
Anoints the temples, forehead, and the lips.
Dryden, tr. of Persius's Satires, ii.

spawl[3] (spâl), v. i. [Formerly also spall; < spawl[3], n.] To throw saliva from the mouth so as to scatter it; eject spittle in a careless, dirty manner: sometimes with indefinite it.

There was such spitting and spalling, as though they had been half choked.
Harrington's Apology (1596). (Nares.)

In disgrace,
To spit and spawl upon his sunbright face.
Quarles, Emblems, iii. 2.

Why must he sputter, spawl, and slaver it? Swift.

spawld, n. A Scotch variant of spald[2] for spall[2].

spawn (spân), v. [Early mod. E. spaune; < ME. spawnen, spanen, < OF. espaundre, espandre, also espandir, shed, spill, pour out, spawn, same as espanir, blow, bloom as a flower, lit. expand, F. épandre, spread, = It. spandere, spill, scatter, shed, < L. expandere, spread out, shed abroad: see expand. Cf. spunnishing.] I. trans. To produce or lay (eggs): said of a female fish, and by extension of other animals; hence, to generate. It is sometimes applied, in contempt, to human beings.

What practices such principles as these may spawn, when they are laid out to the sun, you may determine.
Swift.

II. intrans. 1. To produce or lay eggs of the kinds called spawn, as a fish, frog, mollusk, or crustacean; by extension, to produce offspring: said of other animals, and, in contempt, of human beings.

The Trout usually spawns about October or November.
I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 75.

2. To issue, as the eggs or young of a fish: by extension applied to other animals, and to human beings, in contempt.

The beguiling charms of distinctions and magnificent subtleties have spawned into prodigious monsters, and the birth of error. Evelyn, True Religion, II. 176.

It is so ill a quality, and the mother of so many ill ones that spawn from it, that a child should be brought up in the greatest abhorrence of it. Locke.

spawn (spân), n. and a. [Early mod. E. spaune; < spawn, v.] I. n. 1. The eggs or ova of various oviparous animals, as amphibians, fishes, mollusks, crustaceans, etc., when small and numerous, or extruded in more or less coherent masses; female roe. The number of individual eggs in spawn varies much, and is sometimes prodigiously great: thus, it has been estimated that the spawn of a single codfish may contain several million eggs. In oviparous fishes the eggs are spawned directly into the water, fecundated as they flow out, or afterward, by the milt of the male, and left to hatch by themselves. Fish-spawn is also easily procured by the process of stripping the female, and artificially fecundated by the same process applied to the male, the spawn and milt being mixed together in the water of a vessel made for the purpose. In ovoviviparous fishes the spawn is impregnated in the body of the female, as is usual with the eggs of higher animals. Frogs and toads lay a quantity of spawn consisting of a jelly-like mass in which the eggs are embedded, and it is fertilized as it flows forth. Some shell-fish extrude spawn in firm gelatinous masses, as the common sea-snail, Natica heros. (See sand-saucer.) The mass of eggs (called coral or berry) that a lobster carries under her tail is the spawn or roe of that crustacean; and in various other crustaceans and some fishes the spawn is carried to hatching in special brood-pouches (see opossum-shrimp), which are sometimes in the male instead of the female, as in the sea-horse (see Hippocampidæ). Anadromous fishes are those which leave the sea and run up rivers to spawn; a few fishes are catadromous, or the converse of this. The name spawn is seldom or never given to the eggs of scaly reptiles, birds, or mammals; but the term has sometimes included milt. See spawning.

2. The spat of the oyster, from the time of the discharge of the egg until the shell is visible and the creature has become attached. — 3. Offspring of fish; very small fish; fry. — 4. Offspring in general; a swarming brood: applied, mostly in contempt, to human beings.

To Sem the East, to Cham the South, the West
To Iapheth falls; their seuerall scopes expresst:
Their fruitful Spawn did all the World supply.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Colonies, Arg.

Howe'er that common spawn of ignorance,
Our fry of writers, may beslime his fame.
B. Jonson, Poetaster, Ind.

5. In bot., the mycelium of fungi; the white fibrous matter forming the matrix from which fungi are produced. Certain species of edible fungi, as Agaricus campestris, are propagated artificially by sowing the spawn in prepared beds of horse-droppings and sand.

By this time these will be one mass of natural spawn, having a grey mouldy and thready appearance, and a smell like that of mushrooms.
Cooke and Berkeley, Fungi, p. 257.

The agarics have an abundant mycelium, known to gardeners as the spawn, consisting of white, cottony filaments, which spread in every direction through the soil.
Amer. Cyc., XII. 70.

To shoot spawn. See shoot.

II. a. Containing spawn; spawning, or about to spawn; ripe, as a fish.

spawn-brick (spân'brik), n. In bot., brick-shaped masses of mold or compressed horse-droppings fermented with mushroom-spawn, and used for the artificial sowing or stocking of a mushroom-bed.

The [mushroom-]bed will be ready for spawning, which consists of inserting small pieces of spawn bricks into the sloping sides of the bed, about 6 inches asunder.
Encyc. Brit., XII. 284.

spawn-eater (spân'ē*ʺ*tėr), n. A spawn-eating fish, or other animal which habitually feeds upon spawn, to the detriment of the fisheries or of fish-culture; especially, a cyprinoid fish, Spawn-eater (Notropis hudsonius).

Notropis hudsonius, found in streams along the coast from New York to Virginia. This is one of the largest minnows, from 4 to 8 inches long, of a pale coloration, the sides with a broad silvery band, and usually a dusky spot at the base of the caudal fin. It is sometimes called smelt.

spawned (spând), p. a. 1. Having emitted spawn; spent, as a fish. — 2. Extruded or deposited, as spawn.

spawner (spâ'nėr), n. [< spawn + -er[1].] 1. That which spawns, as the female of fish, frogs, oysters, etc.; a ripe fish about to spawn: correlated with milter.

There the Spawner casts her eggs, and the Melter hovers over her all that time that she is casting her Spawn, but touches her not.
I. Walton, Complete Angler (ed. 1653), p. 147.

2. In fish-culture, a spawn-gatherer. [Recent.]

spawn-fungus (spân'fung*ʺ*gus), n. See fungus.

spawn-hatcher (spân'hach*ʺ*ėr), n. An apparatus for the artificial hatching of the ova of fish. It consists essentially of a box, or a series of boxes, fitted with trays with perforated bottoms to receive the spawn, and arranged for the supply of a regulated current of fresh water.

spawning (spâ'ning), n. [Verbal n. of spawn, v.] The act or process of emitting and fecundating spawn. It consists essentially in the emission by the female of her eggs, and by the male of his milt, in such a manner that they may come in contact with each other, and that the eggs may be placed in a position favorable to their development. The manner, time, and place in which this is performed vary with the species. Some kinds bury their eggs in sand or gravel; some attach them to weeds, sticks, or stones; some build nests of stones or other material; and others drop their eggs carelessly through the water. Fish spawn at all seasons of the year, every species having its appropriate time. Rapid streams, quiet lakes, and sea-bottoms are among the places of deposit. In some cases nests are constructed somewhat elaborately. With the laying of the eggs the care of the parents for their offspring generally ends. Not unfrequently both sire and dam immediately devour their yet unhatched descendants. A few species guard their eggs during incubation, and in some rare cases this care continues after the young fishes are hatched.

spawning-bed (spâ'ning-bed), n. A bed or nest made in the bottom of a stream, as by salmon and trout, in which fish deposit their spawn and milt.

spawning-ground (spâ'ning-ground), n. A water-bottom on which fish deposit their spawn; hence, the body or extent of water to which they resort to spawn; a breeding-place.

spawning-screen (spâ′ning-skrēn), n. In fish-culture, a frame or screen on which the spawn of fish is collected.

spawn-rising (spân′rī′zing), n. In fish-culture, the increase in size of spawn after the milt has been added.

spay[1] (spā), v. t. [Early mod. E. also spaie; dial. spave, spaive, speave; supposed to be < Gael. spoth = Manx spoiy = Bret. spachein, spaza, castrate, geld; cf. W. yspaddu, exhaust, empty, dyspyddu, drain, exhaust; perhaps connected with L. spado, < Gr. σπάδων, a eunuch, < σπᾶν, draw, extract: see spade[4].] To castrate (a female) by extirpating the ovaries. The process corresponds to castration or emasculation of the male, incapacitating the female from breeding, or making her barren. Applied to hens, it corresponds to the caponizing of a cock. It is also practised on other animals, as swine. The animals fatten more readily, and the flesh is improved. Compare Batteg's operation, under operation.

spay[2] (spā), n. [Also spaie; perhaps < OF. espeis, espois,* F. épois, branches of a stag's horns, < G. spitz, a point (cf. G. spitz-hirsch, a stag whose horns have begun to grow pointed): see spit[2], spitz. Cf. spittard, a two-year-old hart.] The male red-deer or hart in his third year.

spay[3], v. See spae.

spayeret, spayret, n. See spare[2].

Spea (spē′ä), n. [NL. (Cope, 1863), < Gr. σπέος, a cave.] A genus of spade-footed toads (Scaphiopodidæ or Pelobatidæ), representing a low type of organization, and peculiar to America. Several species, as S. hammondi and S. bombifrons, inhabit arid regions in the western United States and Mexico, being adapted to dry climate by the rapidity of their metamorphosis. During rains in summer they come out of their holes in the ground, and lay their eggs in rain-pools, where the tadpoles are soon seen swimming. These get their legs very promptly, and go hopping about on dry land. They are very noisy in the spring, like the common spade-foots.

speak (spēk), v.; pret. spoke (spake archaic or poetical), pp. spoken (spoke obs. or vulgar), ppr. speaking. [< ME. speken (pret. spake, spak, spec, spæc, pp. spoken, spoke, earlier spæken, specken, i-speken, ispeke), < late AS. specan, earlier sprecan (pret. spæc, pl. spǣcon, earlier spræc, pl. sprǣcon, pp. specen, earlier sprecen) = OS. sprecan = OFries. spreka = D. spreken = MLG. LG. spreken = OHG. sprehhan, MHG. G. sprechen, speak; cf. MHG. spehten, chatter, G. dial. spähten, speak; root unknown. Hence nlt. speech, and perhaps spook.] I. intrans. 1. To use articulate utterance in the tones of the speaking-voice, in distinction from those of the singing-voice; exert the faculty of speech in uttering words for the expression of thought.

> Sire, are hi beo [ere they be] to dithe awrcke
> We mote ihere the children speke.
> King Horn (E. E. T. S.), p. 69.

Their children spake half in the speech of Ashdod, and could not speak in the Jews' language. Neh. xiii. 24.

Many good scholars speak but fumblingly.
B. Jonson, Discoveries.

2. To make an oral address, as before a magistrate, a tribunal, a public assembly, or a company; deliver a speech, discourse, argument, plea, or the like: as, to speak for or against a person or a cause in court or in a legislature.

Then Agrippa said unto Paul, Thou art permitted to speak for thyself. Acts xxvi. 1.

Lord Sandwich, by a most inconceivable jumble of cunning, spoke for the treaty. Walpole, Letters, II. 278.

3. To make oral communication or mention; talk; converse: as, to speak with a stranger; to speak of or about something; they do not speak to each other.

Than eche toke other be the hande, and wente spekynge of many thinges till thei com to the hostell of Vlfin and Bretell. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 467.

> I must thank him only,
> Lest my remembrance suffer ill report;
> At heel of that, defy him. . . .
> Would we had spoke together.
> Shak., A. and C., ii. 2. 167.

4. To communicate ideas by written or printed words; make mention or tell in recorded speech.

I speak concerning Christ and the church. Eph. v. 32.

The Scripture speaks only of those to whom it speaks.
Hammond.

The Latin convent is thought to have been on mount Gihon, though some seem to speak of that hill as beyond the pool of Gihon. Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 10.

5. To make communication by any intelligible sound, action, or indication; impart ideas or information by any means other than speech or writing; give expression or intimation.

> And let the kettle to the trumpet speak,
> The trumpet to the cannoneer without.
> Shak., Hamlet, v. 2. 286.

> That brow in furrow'd lines had fix'd at last,
> And spake of passions, but of passion past.
> Byron, Lara, i. 5.

> Abate the stride, which speaks of man.
> Tennyson, Princess, ii.

6. Of an organ-pipe, to emit or utter a tone; sound.—7. Naut., to make a stirring and lapping sound in driving through the water: said of a ship.

At length the sniffler reached us, and the sharp little vessel began to speak, as the rushing sound through the water is called; while the wind sang like an Eolian harp through the taut weather-rigging.
M. Scott, Tom Cringle's Log, viii.

8. To bark when ordered: said of dogs.—Ill spoken. See well or ill spoken, below.—Properly speaking. See properly.—So to speak. See so[1].—Speaking acquaintance. (a) A degree of acquaintance extending only to formal intercourse.

Between them and Mr. Wright [the Rector] there was only a speaking acquaintance.
Trollope, Belton Estate, I. 33.

(b) A person with whom one is only sufficiently acquainted to interchange formal salutations or indifferent conversation when meeting casually.—Speaking terms, a relation between persons in which they speak to or converse with each other; usually, an acquaintance limited to speaking in a general way or on indifferent subjects. Not to be on speaking terms is either to be not sufficiently acquainted for passing speech or salutation, or to be so much estranged through disagreement as to be debarred from it.

Our poorer gentry, who never went to town, and were probably not on speaking terms with two out of the five families whose parks lay within the distance of a drive.
George Eliot, Felix Holt, i.

To speak by the card. See card[1].—To speak for. (a) To speak in behalf or in place of; state the case, claims, or views of.

> The general and his wife are talking of it;
> And she speaks for you stoutly.
> Shak., Othello, iii. 1. 47.

> There surely I shall speak for mine own self.
> Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

(b) To afford an indication of; intimate; denote.

Every half mile some pretty farmhouse was shining red through clumps of trees, the many cattle-sheds speaking for the wealth of the owner. Froude, Sketches, p. 93.

To speak holiday†. See holiday, a.—To speak in lutestring†. See lutestring[2].—To speak like a book. See book.—To speak of. (a) See def. 3. (b) To take or make account of; mention as notable or of consequence; deserve mention.

> Those Countries neerest Tigris Spring,
> In those first ages were most flourishing,
> Most spoken-of.
> Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Colonies.

Strangers . . . that pay to their owne Lords the tenth, and not to the owner of those liberties any thing to speake of. Capt. John Smith, Works, II. 244.

To speak out, to speak loud or louder; hence, to speak freely, boldly, or without reserve; disclose what one knows or thinks about a certain matter.—To speak to. (a) To answer for; attest; account for.

For a far longer time than they, the modern observatories, can directly speak to. Piazzi Smyth, Pyramid, p. 74.

(b) To admonish or rebuke. [Colloq. and euphemistic.]

"Papa," he exclaimed, in a loud, plaintive voice, as of one deeply injured, "will you speak to Giles? . . . If this sort of thing is allowed to go on, . . . it will perfectly ruin the independence of my character."
Jean Ingelow, Off the Skelligs, xix.

To speak to one's heart. See heart.—To speak up, to express one's thoughts freely, boldly, or unreservedly; speak out.

Speak up, jolly blade, never fear.
Robin Hood and Little John (Child's Ballads, V. 221).

To speak well for, to be a commendatory or favorable indication of or with regard to: as, his eagerness speaks well for him, or for his success.—Well or ill spoken, given to speaking well or ill; given to using decorous or indecorous speech, in either a literal or a moral sense.

> Thou speak'st
> In better phrase and matter than thou didst. . . .
> Methinks you're better spoken. Shak., Lear, iv. 6. 10.

He was wise and discreete and well spoken, having a grave & deliberate utterance.
Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 413.

=Syn. Speak, Talk. Speak is more general in meaning than talk. Thus, a man may speak by uttering a single word, whereas to talk is to utter words consecutively; so a man may be able to speak without being able to talk. Speak is also more formal in meaning: as, to speak before an audience; while talk implies a conversational manner of speaking.

II. trans. 1. To utter orally and articulately; express with the voice; enunciate.

And thei seide, "That he is, for this thre dayes he spake no specche, ne neuer shall specke worde."
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 94.

They sat down with him upon the ground seven days and seven nights, and none spake a word unto him.
Job ii. 13.

2. To declare; utter; make known by speech; tell, announce, or express in uttered words.

Grant unto thy servants that with all boldness they may speak thy word. Acts iv. 29.

> One that, to speak the truth,
> Had all those excellencies that our books
> Have only feign'd.
> Middleton, Anything for a Quiet Life, i. 1.

> I am come to speak
> Thy praises. Bryant, Hymn to Death.

3. To use in oral utterance; express one's self in the speech or tongue of: as, a person may read a language which he cannot speak.

The Arabic language is spoke very little north of Aleppo.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 154.

4. To accost or address in speech; specifically (naut.), to accost at sea; hail and hold communication with by the voice, as a passing vessel.

About six bells, that is three o'clock P. M., we saw a sail on our larboard bow. I was very desirous, like every new sailor, to speak her.
R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 10.

5. To say, either in speech or in writing; use as a form of speech.

A beavie of ladyes is spoken figuratively for a company or troupe: the terme is taken of Larkes.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., April, Glosse.

6. To produce by means or as a result of speech; bring about or into being by utterance; call forth.

> They sung how God spoke out the World's vast Ball;
> From Nothing and from No where call'd forth All.
> Cowley, Davideis, i.

7. To mention as; speak of as being; call. [Obsolete or rare.]

> Mayst thou live ever spoken our protector!
> Fletcher, Valentinian, v. 8.

8. To make known as if by speech; give speaking evidence of; indicate; show to be; declare.

> Whatever his reputed parents be,
> He hath a mind that speaks him right and noble.
> Fletcher, Spanish Curate, i. 1.

> And for the heaven's wide circuit, let it speak
> The Maker's high magnificence.
> Milton, P. L., viii. 101.

Eleanor's countenance was dejected, yet sedate; and its composure spoke her inured to all the gloomy objects to which they were advancing.
Jane Austen, Northanger Abbey, xxiv.

To speak a ship. See def. 4, above.—To speak daggers. See dagger[1].—To speak (a person) fair, to address in fair or pleasing terms; speak to in a friendly way.

Oh run, dear friend, and bring the lord Philaster! speak him fair; call him prince; do him all the courtesy you can. Beau. and Fl., Philaster, v. 3.

To speak for, to establish a claim to by prior assertion; ask or engage in advance: as, we have spoken for seats; she is already spoken for.—To speak one's mind, to express one's opinion, especially with emphasis.

The Romans had a time once every year, when their Slaves might freely speake their minds.
Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.

To speak out, to utter openly; proclaim boldly.

> But strait I'l make his Dumbness find a Tongue
> To speak out his imposture, and thy wrong.
> J. Beaumont, Psyche, ii. 104.

=Syn. Tell, State, etc. See say[1].

speakable (spē′ka-bl), a. [< speak + -able.] 1. Capable of being spoken; fit to be uttered.

The other, . . . heaping oaths upon oaths, . . . most horrible and not speakable, was rebuked of an honest man. Ascham, Toxophilus, i.

2†. Having the power of speech. [Rare.]

> Redouble then this miracle, and say > How cam'st thou speakable of mute?
> Milton, P. L., ix. 563.

speaker (spē′kėr), n. [< ME. speker, spekere (= OFries. spreker (in forspreker) = D. MLG. spreker = OHG. sprāhhari, sprāchari, sprehhari, sprekheri, sprechari, MHG. sprechære, sprecher, G. sprecher, a speaker): < speak + -er[1].] 1. One who speaks or utters words; one who talks or converses; one who makes a speech or an address; specifically, one who engages in or practises public speaking.

Thei seyn also that Abrsham was Frend to God, and that Moyses was familier spekere with God.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 136.

Besrers far more strange of the Roman nsme, though no speakers of the Roman tongue, are there in special abundance. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 57.

2. A proclaimer; a publisher. [Rare.]

> After my death I wish no other herald,
> No other speaker of my living actions.
> Shak., Hen. VIII., iv. 2. 70.

3. [cap.] The title of the presiding officer in the British House of Commons, in the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, in the lower houses of State legislatures in the United States, and in British colonial legislatures; also of the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain as presiding officer of the House of Lords. The Speaker of the House of Commons is elected in each Parliament from its members, with the royal concurrence, generally without regard to politics, and may preside in successive Parliaments of opposite political character. His powers (which have been much diminished in the course of time) are limited to the preservation of order and the regulation of debate under the rules of the House, the use of the casting-vote in case of an equal division, and speaking in general committee. The Speaker in the House of Representatives (as also in the State legislatures) is usually a leader of the party having a majority of the members, and has, in addition to the powers of the British Speaker, the power of appointing all committees, and the right, as a member, of participating in general debate after calling another member to the chair, and of voting on all questions — rights exercised, however, only on important occasions. He is thus in a position to control the course of legislation to an important extent, and the office is consequently regarded as of great power and influence.

I hear that about twelve of the Lords met and had chosen my Lord Manchester speaker of the House of Lords.
Pepys, Diary, April 26, 1660.

In the Lower House the Speaker of the Tudor reigns is in very much the same position as the Chancellor in the Upper House; he is the manager of business on the part of the crown, and probably the nominee either of the king himself or of the chancellor.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 272.

Not only that the Standing Committees are the most essential machinery of our governmental system, but also that the Speaker of the House of Representatives is the most powerful functionary of that system.
W. Wilson, Cong. Gov., p. 103.

4. A title, and hence a general name, for a book containing selections for practice in declamation, as at school. [U. S.]

speakership (spē′kėr-ship), n. [< speaker + -ship.] The office of Speaker in a legislative body.

speaking (spē′king), p. a. Adapted to inform or impress as if by speech; forcibly expressive or suggestive; animated or vivid in appearance: as, a speaking likeness; speaking gestures.

A representation borrowed, indeed, from the actual world, but closer to thought, more speaking and significant, more true than nature and life itself. J. Caird.

The smallness of Spalato, as compared with the greatness of ancient Salona, is a speaking historical lesson.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 172.

Speaking demurrer, in law, a demurrer which alleges or suggests a fact which to be available would require evidence, and which therefore cannot avail on demurrer.

speakingly (spē′king-li), adv. In a speaking manner; so as to produce the effect of speech; very expressively.

A Mute is one that acteth speakingly,
And yet sayes nothing. Brome, Antipodes, v. 4.

speaking-machine (spē′king-ma-shēn′), n. A mechanical contrivance for producing articulate sounds automatically; a speaking automaton.

Kempelen's and Kratzenstein's speaking-machine, in the latter part of the last century; the speaking-machine made by Fabermann of Vienna, closely imitating the human voice. Encyc. Brit., XV. 208.

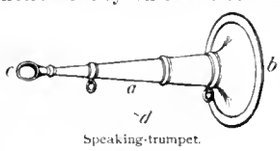
speaking-trumpet (spē′king-trum′pet), n. A trumpet-shaped instrument by which the sound of the human voice is reinforced so that it may be heard at a great distance or above other sounds, as in hailing ships at sea or giving orders at a fire. In the United States navy a speaking-trumpet is the badge of the officer of the deck at sea.



Speaking-trumpet.
a, tube; b, bell; c, mouthpiece; d, rings for a band by which the trumpet may be attached to the person.

speaking-tube (spē′king-tūb), n. A tube of sheet-tin, gutta-percha, or other material, serving to convey the voice to a distance, as from one building to another, or from one part of a building to another, as from an upper floor to the street-door, or from the rooms of a hotel to the office. It is commonly used in connection with an annunciator, and is usually fitted at each end with a whistle for calling attention.

speaking-voice (spē′king-vois), n. The kind of voice used in speaking: opposed to singing-voice, or the kind of voice used in singing. The singing-voice and the speaking-voice differ in several respects: (a) in pitch and inflection, which are arbitrary in singing, but conformed to the thought in speaking; (b) in succession of tones, the tones of music being discrete, while those of speech are concrete; (c) in time and emphasis, which in music are more arbitrary and less conformed to the thought than in speech. So great is the difference that many persons who have a good voice for one use have a very poor voice for the other.

speal[1] (spēl), n. Same as spell[4], spill[2].

speal[2]†, n. An obsolete variant of spall[2].

speal-bone (spēl′bōn), n. The shoulder-blade. —Reading the speal-bone, scapulimancy; divination by means of a shoulder-blade. E. B. Tylor, Prim. Cult., I. 125. Compare spatulamancy.

spean (spēn), n. [< ME. spene, < AS. spana, teat, udder; cf. spanan, wean: see spane.] An animal's teat. [Old and prov. Eng.]

It hath also four speanes to her paps.
Topsell, Four-footed Beasts, p. 38. (Halliwell.) spear[1] (spēr), n. [< ME. spere, pl. speres, speren, < AS. spere = OS. sper = OFries. sper, spiri = MD. spere, D. speer = MLG. sper, spere = OHG. MHG. sper, G. speer (> OF. espier) = Icel. spjōr, pl., = Dan. spær, a spear (the L. sparus, a small missile weapon, dart, hunting-spear, is prob. < Teut.); perhaps akin to spar, a beam, bar: see spar[1]. In def. 7 prob. confused with spire[1].] 1. A weapon consisting of a penetrating head attached to a long shaft of wood, designed to be thrust by or launched from the hand at an enemy or at game. Spears have been used as warlike weapons from the earliest times, and were the principal reliance of many ancient armies, as those of the Greeks, while in others they were used coördinately with the bow and the sword. They are represented by the bayonet in modern armies, though some use is still made of spears, of which javelins and lances are lighter, and pikes heavier, forms. Compare cuts under bayonet and pike.

Hunting-spears, 15th or 16th century.

Whan thei were ouer, thei smyten in a-monge hem so vigorously that oon myght here the crassinge of speres half a myle longe.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), II. 155.

They shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks. Isa. ii. 4.

2. A man armed with a spear; a spearman.

Earl Doorm
Struck with a knife's haft hard against the board,
And call'd for flesh and wine to feed his spears.
Tennyson, Gcraint.

3. A sharp-pointed instrument with barbed tines, generally three or four, used for stabbing fish and other animals; a fish-gig.—4. An instrument like or suggestive of an actual spear, as some articles of domestic or mechanical use, one of the long pieces fixed transversely to the beam or body of chevaux-de-frise, in some parts of England a bee's sting, etc.—5. One of the pieces of timber which together form the main rod of the Cornish pumping-engine.—6. The feather of a horse. Also called the streak of the spear. It is a mark in the neck or near the shoulder of some barbs, which is reckoned a sure sign of a good horse.

7. A spire: now used only of the stalks of grasses: as, a spear of wheat.

Tell me the motes, dust, sands, and speares
Of corn, when Summer shakes his eares.
Herrick, To Find God.

The speare or steeple of which churche was fired by lightening.
Lambarde, Perambulation (1596), p. 287. (Halliwell.)

Holy spear. Same as holy lance. See lance[1].—Spear pyrites, a variety of marcasite.—Spear side, occasionally spear half, a phrase sometimes used to denote the male line of a family, in contradistinction to distaff or spindle side (or half), the female line. See distaff side, under distaff.

A King who by the spindle-side sprang from both William and Cerdic, but who by the spear-side had nothing to do with either.
E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, V. 168.

To sell under the spear†, to sell by auction: from the ancient Roman practice of setting a spear (hasta) in the ground at an auction, originally as a sign of the sale of military booty.

My lords the senators
Are sold for slaves, their wives for bondwomen, . . .
And all their goods, under the spear, at outcry.
B. Jonson, Catiline, ii.

spear[1] (spēr), v. [< spear[1], n.] I. trans. To pierce or strike with a spear or similar weapon: as, to spear fish.

The [Australian] youngsters generally celebrated the birth of a lamb by spearing it.
C. Reade, Never too Late to Mend, li.

The Mayfly is torn by the swallow, the sparrow spear'd by the shrike. Tennyson, Maud, iv. 4.

II. intrans. To shoot into a long stem; germinate, as barley. See spire[1].

The single blade [of wheat] spears first into three, then into five or more side-shoots. Science, VII. 174.

spear[2]† (spēr), v. An obsolete form of speer[1].

spear-billed (spēr′bild), a. Having a long, straight, and sharp bill, beak, or rostrum: as, the spear-billed grebes of the genus Echmophorus. See cut under Echmophorus. Coues.

spear-dog (spēr′dog), n. The common piked dog-fish, Squalus acanthias or Acanthias vulgaris. [Local, Eng.]

spearer (spēr′ėr), n. [< spear[1] + -er[1].] 1. One who spears.—2. A person armed with a spear, whether for war or for ceremony.

spear-fish (spēr′fish), n. 1. A catostomoid fish of the genus Carpiodes, C. cyprinus, a kind of carp-sucker, also called sailfish, skimback, and quillback. It is common from the Mississippi valley to Chesapeake Bay.—2. The bill-fish, Tetrapturus albidus, belonging to the family Histiophoridæ, or sailfishes. The dorsal fin is low or moderately developed, and the ventrals are represented only by spines. It inhabits American waters as far north as New England in summer, and is not seldom taken in the sword-fishery. In tropical seas its horizon is about 100 fathoms deep. The spear-fish is related to the sword-fish (though of another family), and has a similar beak or sword. It attains a length of six or eight feet. In the West Indies its Spanish name is aguja. Compare cut under sailfish.

Spear-fish (Tetrapturus albidus).

spear-flower (spēr′flou″ėr), n. A tree or shrub of the large tropical and subtropical genus Ardisia of the Myrsineæ. The species are mostly handsome with white or red flowers and pea-form fruit, often blue. The name translates Ardisia, which alludes to the sharp segments of the calyx.

spear-foot (spēr′fůt), n. The off or right hind foot of a horse.

spear-grass (spēr′gràs), n. 1. A name of various species of Agrostis, bent-grass, of Agropyrum repens, quitch-grass, of Alopecurus agrestis, foxtail, and perhaps of some other grasses. The spear-grass of Shakspere, according to Ellacombe, is the quitch-grass; according to Prior, it is the common reed, Phragmites communis. [Old or prov. Eng.]

To tickle our noses with spear-grass to make them bleed. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., ii. 4. 340.

2. The June-grass, or Kentucky blue-grass, Poa pratensis (see cut under Poa); also other species of the genus. P. annua is the low or annual spear-grass. It is so called from the lance-shaped spikelets. (See meadow-grass.) The name is said to be applied also to the porcupine-grass, on account of its awns. [U. S.]

3. In New Zealand, a name of one or two plants of the umbelliferous genus Aciphylla: so called from their long grass-like leaflets, which have hard and sharp points.

spear-hand (spēr′hand), n. The right hand or the right side, as distinguished from the shield-hand.

spear-head (spēr′hed), n. The head of a spear. It is always pointed, and of iron or steel among people who know the use of iron, but anciently of bronze, and among some savage peoples of stone, bone, or the like. The form varies from that of a long double-edged blade which with its socket is two feet or more in length, as was common in throwing-spears of the Franks and Saxons, to the head of the fourteenth-century lance, which was a mere pointing of the wooden shaft with steel and only a few inches in length. The spear-head is often barbed, sometimes serrated or wavy, etc. Compare coronal, 2, also pilum, lance[1], javelin.

spear-hook (spēr′hůk), n. Same as spring-hook.

spear-javelin (spēr′jav″lin), n. Same as framea, 1.

spear-leafed lily. See lily, 1.

spear-lily (spēr′lil″i), n. A plant of one of three species of the Australian genus Doryanthes of the Amaryllideæ. It has partly the habit of Agave, having a cluster of over one hundred sword-shaped leaves at the base, an erect stem, in D. excelsa from 10 to 18 feet high, with a dense terminal head of red flowers. The leaves of that species contain a fiber suitable for rope- and paper-making.

spearman (spēr′man), n.; pl. spearmen (-men). [< ME. sperman; < spear[1] + man.] 1. One who uses or is armed with a spear; especially, a soldier whose spear is his principal weapon. Compare lancer, lansquenet, pikeman[1].

Wily as an eel that stirs the mud
Thick overhead, so baffling spearman's thrust.
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 162.

2. A book-name for any leaf-beetle of the genus Doryphora. The Colorado potato-beetle, D. decemlineata, is the ten-lined spearman. See cut under beetle.

spearmint (spēr′-mint), n. [Said to be a corruption of spire-mint, with ref. to the pyramidal inflorescence.] An Spearmint (Mentha viridis), upper part of the stem with the inflorescence. a, a flower.

aromatic plant, Mentha viridis, the common garden-mint, or mint proper. It is known chiefly in gardens, or as an escape from them, in both hemispheres, and is suspected to be a garden or accidental variety of M. sylvestris. Its properties are those of peppermint, and it yields an oil like that of the latter, but with a more pleasant flavor.—Spirit of spearmint. See spirit.

spear-nail (spēr'nāl), n. A form of nail with a spear-shaped point.

spear-plate (spēr'plāt), n. Same as strapping-plate.

spear-thistle (spēr'this‴l), n. See thistle.

spear-widgeon (spēr'wij‴on), n. 1. The red-breasted merganser, Mergus serrator. Also called shelduck.—2. The goosander, Mergus merganser. [Irish in both uses.]

spearwood (spēr'wùd), n. One of two Australian trees, Eucalyptus Doratoxylon in the southwest, and Acacia Doratoxylon in the interior, or the wood of the same, sought by the natives for spear-shafts.

spearwort (spēr'wèrt), n. [< ME. spereworte, sperewurt, < AS. sperewyrt, < spere, spear, + wyrt, wort: see spear[1] and wort[1].] The name of several species of crowfoot or Ranunculus, with lance-shaped leaves. R. Lingua, the greater spearwort, is found in Europe and temperate Asia; R. Flammula, the lesser spearwort (also called banewort), through the north temperate zone; R. ophioglossifolius, the snake's-tongue or adder's-tongue spearwort, in southwestern Europe; R. ambigens (R. alismæfolius), the water-plantain spearwort, in North America.

speat, n. Same as spate.

speave, v. t. A dialectal form of spay[1].

spec[1] (spek), n. A colloquial abbreviation of speculation.

They said what a wery gen'rous thing it was o' them to have taken up the case on spec, and to charge nothing at all for costs unless they got 'em out of Mr. Pickwick.
Dickens, Pickwick, xxxiv.

spec.[2] In nat. hist., an abbreviation of specimen: with a plural specs., sometimes spece. Compare sp.

specet, n. A Middle English form of spice[1].

special (spesh'al), a. and n. [< ME. special, speciall, specialle, specyal, specyalle, < OF. special, especial, F. spécial = Pr. special, especial = Sp. especial = Pg. especial = It. speziale, special, < L. specialis, belonging to a species, particular, < species, kind, species: see species. Doublet, especial.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a species or sort; of a particular kind or character; distinct from other kinds; specifically characteristic.

Crist! kepe us out of harme and hate,
For thin hooli spirit so special.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 57.

A special idea is called by the schools a species.
Watts, Logic, I. iii. § 3.

A certain order of artistic culture should be adopted, answering to the order of development of the special sensibilities and faculties concerned.
J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 553.

2. Of or pertaining to one or more of a kind; peculiar to an individual or a set; not general; particular; individual.

He spekis thus in his speciall spell,
And of this matere makis he mynde.
York Plays, p. 471.

For the question in hand, whether the commandments of God in Scripture be general or special, it skilleth not.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iii. 7.

The special charm of Oxford for Shelley lay in the comparative freedom of the student's life.
E. Dowden, Shelley, I. 56.

3. Peculiar or distinct of the kind; of exceptional character, amount, degree, or the like; especially distinguished; express; particular.

Thei suffre no Cristene man entre in to that Place, but zif it be of specyalle graee of the Soudan.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 66.

Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud,
Without our special wonder?
Shak., Macbeth, iii. 4. 112.

It is a fair and sensible paper, not of special originality or brilliancy. O. W. Holmes, Emerson, i.

Other groups of phenomena require special study.
H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 382.

4. Specifically, limited as to function, operation, or purpose; designed for specific application or service; acting for a limited time or in a restricted manner; not general of the kind named: as, special legislation; special pleading; a special agent, constable, or correspondent; special employment; a special dictionary.

Too all his ost he gave a speciall charge,
Ayenst that day that he shuld fight alone.
Generydes (E. E. T. S.), l. 3221.

To Eltham will I, where the young king is,
Being ordain'd his special governor.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., i. 1. 171.

Estate tail special. See estate.—Heir special. See heir.—Special act. See statute.—Special administrator, an administrator appointed without full powers of administration, but for some special purpose, as to collect and hold assets and pay urgent debts pending a contest as to the probate of a will. Also called a temporary administrator, a collector, or an administrator ad colligendum.—Special agent, an agent authorized to transact in the service or interest of his principal only a particular transaction or a particular kind of business, as distinguished from a general agent: as, a special agent of the revenue department.—Special anatomy. See anatomy.—Special assignment. See partial assignment, under partial.—Special bail. See bail[2], 3.—Special bailiff, bastard, case. See the nouns.—Special carrier. See carrier[1], 2.—Special commission, in law, a commission of oyer and terminer issued by the crown to the judges for the trial of specified cases.—Special constable, contract, damages, demurrer, deposit, edict, homology, hospital, injunction, issue, jury, license, etc. See the nouns.—Special linear complex, the aggregate of all the lines of space that cut a given line.—Special logic, the rules for thinking concerning a certain kind of objects.

Such special logics only exhibit the mode in which a determinate matter or object of science, the knowledge of which is presupposed, must be treated, the conditions which regulate the certainty of inferences in that matter, and the methods by which our knowledge of it may be constructed into a scientific whole.
Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, iii.

Special orders, paper, partner, plea, pleader, pleading, property, providence, retainer, sessions, statute, tail, verdict, etc. See the nouns.—Special trust, an active trust; a trust which involves specific duties on the part of the trustee, as distinguished from a general or naked trust, in which he holds only a legal title and it may be possession, but the entire right of disposal is in the beneficiary.—Syn. Special, Especial, Particular, Peculiar, Specific. Special is more common than especial, which has the same meaning; but especially is for rhythmical reasons (because it occurs most frequently at the beginning of a dependent clause, where usually an unaccented particle occurs, and where, therefore, a word with an accent on the first syllable is instinctively avoided) much more common than specially. The special comes under the general, as the particular comes under the special. A special favor is one that is more than ordinary; a particular favor is still more remarkable; a peculiar favor comes very closely home. When we speak of any particular thing, we distinguish it from all others; when we speak of a specific fault in one's character, we name it with exactness; a special law is one that is made for a particular purpose or a peculiar case; a specific law is either one that we name exactly or one that names offenses, etc., exactly.

II. n. 1. A special or particular person or thing. Specifically—(a) A particular thing; a particular.

Thir 's all the specials I of speake.
Raid of the Reidswire (Child's Ballads, VI. 138).

(b†) A private companion; a paramour or concubine.

Specyal, concubyne, the womann (speciall or leman). Concubina. Prompt. Parv., p. 468.

Syr Roger of Donkester,
That was her owne speciall.
Lytell Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V. 123).

2. A person or thing appointed or set apart for a special purpose or occasion, as a constable, a railway-train, an examination, a dispatch, etc.: as, they traveled by special to Chicago; the specials were called out to quell the riot.

What are known as specials are being held this week. These are for men who partially failed at the last regular examinations. Lancet, 1890, II. 796.

In apecial, in a special manner; especially; particularly. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Se that thow in special Requere noght that is ageyns hire nam.
Chaucer, Troilus, i. 901.

But yf vertue and nurture were withe alle;
To yow therfore I speke in specyalle.

specialisation, specialise. See specialization, specialize.

specialism (spesh'al-izm), n. [< special + -ism.] Devotion to a special branch or division of a general subject or pursuit; the characteristic pursuit or theme of a specialist; restriction to a specialty. [Recent.]

Special hospitals and specialism in medical practice are in danger of being carried too far. Lancet, 1889, II. 1049.

All specialism of study, one-sidedness of view, and division of labor is dangerous [according to Comte].
N. A. Rev., CXX. 259.

specialist (spesh'al-ist), n. [< special + -ist.] A person who devotes himself to a particular branch of a profession, science, or art; one who has a special knowledge of some particular subject: thus, ophthalmologists, neurologists, or gynecologists are specialists in medicine.

Specialists are the coral-insects that build up a reef.
O. W. Holmes, Poet at the Breakfast-table, iii.

specialistic (spesh-a-lis'tik), a. [< specialist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a specialist or specialism. [Recent.]

The learned specialistic mind takes in the facts of one or two creeds or departments. Athenæum, No. 3273, p. 87.

speciality (spesh-i-al'i-ti), n.; pl. specialities (-tiz). [< OF. specialité, especialite, F. spécialité = Sp. especialidad = Pg. especialidade = It. specialità (> D. specialiteit = G. specialität = Sw. Dan. specialitet), < L. specialita(t-)s, particularity, peculiarity, < specialis, particular, special: see special. Cf. specialty, a doublet of speciality, as personalty, realty, etc., are of personality, reality, etc.] 1. A special characteristic or attribute; a distinctive feature, property, or quality; a condition or circumstance especially distinguishing a class or an individual. [In this abstract sense speciality is preferable to the form specialty, on the analogy of personality, reality, and other words of similar tenor as related to personalty, realty, etc. The distinction, so far as it exists, is accidental; the syncopated form, in these pairs, is more vernacular, the full form more recent and artificial.]

It is the speciality of all vice to be selfishly indifferent to the injurious consequences of our actions, even . . . to those nearest to us. F. P. Cobbe, Peak in Darien, p. 32.

The specialities of nature, chiefly mental, which we see produced, . . . must be ascribed almost wholly to direct equilibration. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 170.

2. A special matter or thing; a characteristic or distinctive object, pursuit, diversion, operation, product, or the like; a specialty. See specialty, 6.

The speciality of the sport was to see how some for his slackness had a good bob with the hag.
Laneham, quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 191.

The small State of Rhode Island, whose speciality has always been the manufacture of ordnance.
Comte de Paris, Civil War in America (trans.), I. 187.

specialization (spesh‴al-i-zā'shon), n. [< specialize + -ation.] 1. The act or process of specializing; a making or fixing of special differences or requirements; differentiation.

In the history of Law the most important early specialisation is that which separates what a man ought to do from what he ought to know.
Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 18.

2. The state of being or becoming specialized; a condition of fixed or developed differentiation, as of parts, organs, or individuals, with reference to form, appearance, function, etc.

That there is [in women] . . . a mental specialization joined with the bodily specialization is undeniable; and this mental specialization, though primarily related to the rearing of offspring, affects in some degree the conduct at large. H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 375.

3. In biol., that evolutionary process whereby parts or organs primitively indifferent or of common character become differentiated in form or function (usually in both); also, the result of such process or course of development; adaptive modification. The most exact synonym is differentiation (which see). It is common to say differentiation of structure, but specialization of function, giving to the former word a morphological and to the latter a physiological significance. Since, however, change of form almost always implies change in use of the parts thus modified in adaptation to different purposes, the two words come to the same thing in the end, and may be interchanged. The whole course of biological evolution is from the most general to some particular form and function, or from that which is simple, primitive, indifferent, and low in the scale of organization to that which is a complex of particulars and thus highly organized. Such specialization is expressed both in the structure of any of the higher animals and plants, regarded as wholes to be compared with other wholes, and in the structure of their several parts, organs, or tissues, compared with one another in the same animal or plant, and compared with the corresponding parts, organs, or tissues in different animals and plants. The actual ways in which or means by which specialization is known or supposed to be effected are among the broadest problems in biology. See biological matter under evolution, Darwinism, selection, survival, variation, species, protoplasm, morphology, homology, analogy, heredity, environment, and words of like bearing on the points in question.

All physiologists admit that the specialization of organs, inasmuch as they perform in this state their functions better, is an advantage to each being.
Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 122.

This [frizzly] character of hair must be a specialization, for it seems very unlikely that it was the attribute of the common ancestors of the human race.
W. H. Flower, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 320.

Also spelled specialisation.

specialize (spesh'al-īz), v.; pret. and pp. specialized, ppr. specializing. [= F. spécialiser; as special + -ize.] I. trans. 1. To make individually or generically special or distinct; make specifically distinct; differentiate from other kinds in form, adaptation, or characteristics, as by a process of physical development; limit to a particular kind of development, action, or use. See specialization, 3.

The sensitiveness of the filaments [of Dionæa Muscipula] is of a specialized nature, being related to a momentary touch rather than to prolonged pressure.
Darwin, Insectiv. Plants, p. 292.

The eye is a highly specialized organ, admirably adapted for the important function which it fulfils.
Stokes, Light, p. 90.

Prudence may be said to be merely Wisdom specialized by the definite acceptance of Self-interest as its sole ultimate end. H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 304.

2†. To mention specially or in detail; particularize; specify.

Our Saviour specialising and nominating the places.
Sheldon, Miracles (1616), p. 261.

II. intrans. To act in some special way; pursue a special course or direction; take a specific turn or bent.

That some cells have specialised on the amœbold character is seen in the so-called myeloplaxes.
Lancet, 1889, II. 635.

Also spelled specialise.

specializer (spesh′al-ī-zėr), n. One who makes a specialty of anything; a specialist. Also spelled specialiser. The Nation.

specially (spesh′al-i), adv. [< ME. specially, specialliche; < special + *-ly*2. Doublet of especially.] 1. In a special manner; specifically; particularly; exceptionally; especially.

Thay suld be clene of euery vyce,
And, speciallie, of Couatyee.
Lauder, Dewtie of Kyngis (E. E. T. S.), l. 461.

The earth . . . of Scripture generally is specially the dry land. Dawson, Natnre and the Bible, p. 101.

2. For a particular reason or purpose; by special or exceptional action or proceeding: as, a meeting specially called; an officer specially designated.

The Latin tongue lived on in Britain after the withdrawal of the legions, but it lived on, as it lives on in modern countries, as a book-language specially learned.
E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 124.

specialty (spesh′al-ti), n.; pl. specialties (-tiz). [< ME. specialte, < OF. specialte, speciaute, especialte, especiaute, etc., a more vernacular form of specialite, especialite, etc., speciality: see speciality.] 1. The fact or condition of being special or particular; particularity of origin, cause, use, significance, etc. [Rare.]

And that they that be ordeynyd to sette messys bryng them be ordre and continuelly tyl alle be serued, and not inordinatly, And thorow affeccion to personys or by specialte. Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 330.

It is no denial of the specialty of vital or psychical phenomena to reduce them to the same elementary motions as those manifested in cosmic phenomena.
G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. vi. § 35.

2. The special or distinctive nature of anything; essence; principle; groundwork. [Rare.]

The specialty of rule hath been neglected.
Shak., T. and C., i. 3. 78.

3. A special quality or characteristic; a distinguishing feature; a speciality. See speciality, 1.

The Last Supper at San Marco is an excellent example of the natural reverence of an artist of that time, with whom reverence was not, as one may say, a specialty.
H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 298.

4. A special or particular matter or thing; something specific or exceptional in character, relation, use, or the like.

Acosta numbreth diuerse strange specialties, excepted from the generall Rules of Natures wonted course.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 872.

5. A special employment or pursuit; a distinct occupation or division of duty or interest; that which one does especially, either by choice or by assignment.

As each individual selects a special mode of activity for himself, and aims at improvement in that specialty, he finds himself attaining a higher and still higher degree of aptitude for it.
Dr. Carpenter, Correlation and Conserv. of Forces, p. 410.

6. A special product or manufacture; something made in a special manner or form, or especially characteristic of the producer or of the place of production: as, a dealer in specialties; also, an article to which a dealer professes to pay special attention or care, or which is alleged to possess special advantages in regard to quality, quantity, or price: as, fountain-pens a specialty. See the second quotation under speciality, 2.—7. In law, an instrument under seal, containing an express or implied agreement for the payment of money. The word has also been loosely used to include obligations or debts upon recognizance, judgments and decrees, and statutes, because these, being matter of record, rank in solemnity, conclusiveness, and endurance with free contracts under seal.

Let specialties be therefore drawn between us.
Shak., T. of the S., ii. 1. 127.

All instruments under seal, of record, and liabilities imposed by statute, are specialties within the meaning of the Stat. 21 James I. Wood, On Limitation of Actions, § 29.

specie (spē′shiē or -shē), n. [L. specie, abl. of species, kind, formerly much used in the phrase in specie, in kind, in ML. in coin: see species.] 1. As a Latin noun, used in the phrase in specie: (a) In kind.

So a lion is a perfect creature in himself, though it be less than that of a buffalo, or a rhinocerote. They differ but in specie; either in the kind is absolute; both have their parts, and either the whole. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

You must pay him in specie, Madam; give him love for his wit. Dryden, Mock Astrologer, v. 1.

Uneconomical application of punishment, though proper, perhaps, as well in specie as in degree.
Bentham, Introd. to Morals and Legislation, xvi. 54, note.

(b) In coin. See def. 2. Hence, as an English noun—2. Coin; metallic money; a medium of exchange consisting of gold or silver (the precious metals) coined by sovereign authority in pieces of various standard weights and values, and of minor coins of copper, bronze, or some other cheap or base metal: often used attributively. The earliest coinage of specie is attributed to the Lydians, about the eighth century B. C. Previously, and long afterward in many countries, pieces of silver and gold (the latter only to a small extent) were passed by weight in payments, as lumps of silver are still in China. The use of specie as a measure of price is based upon the intrinsic value of the precious metals as commodities, which has diminished immensely since ancient times, but is comparatively stable for long periods under normal circumstances. In modern civilized communities specie or bullion is largely used by banks as a basis or security for circulating notes (bank-notes) representing it. In times of great financial disturbance this security sometimes becomes inadequate from depletion or through excessive issues of notes, and a general suspension of specie payments takes place, followed by great depreciation of the paper money. General suspensions of specie payments occurred in the United States in 1837, 1857, and 1861, the last, due to the civil war, continuing till 1879. Specie payments by British banks were suspended by law, in consequence of the French wars, from 1797 to 1823, but were actually resumed by the Bank of England in 1821. Similar interruptions of solvency have occurred in the other European countries, resulting in Austria and Russia in an apparently permanent substitution of depreciated paper money for specie in ordinary use and reckoning.—Specie circular, in U. S. hist., a circular issued by the Secretary of the Treasury in July, 1836, by direction of President Jackson, ordering United States agents to receive in future only gold and silver or Treasury certificates in payment for government lands.

species (spē′shēz), n.; pl. species. [In ME. spece, spice, species, kind, spice (see *spice*1); in mod. E. directly from the L.; = F. espèce, species (espèces, coin), = Sp. Pg. especie = It. spezie = G. Dan. Sw. species, species (D. specie = Dan. specie, specie), < L. species, a seeing, sight, usually in passive sense, look, form, show, display, beauty, an apparition, etc., a particular sort, a species, LL. a special case, also spices, drugs, fruits, provisions, etc., ML. also a potion, a present, valuable property, NL. also coin, < specere, look, see, = OHG. spehōn, MHG. spehen (> It. spiare = Pr. Sp. Pg. espiar = OF. espier, F. épier: see spy), G. spähen, spy, = Gr. σκέπτεσθαι, look, = Skt. √ spaç, later paç, see. Hence special, especial, specie, specify, specious, spice, etc. From the same L. verb are ult. E. spectacle, aspect, expect, inspect, prospect, respect, suspect, etc., respite, despise, suspicion, etc., and the second element in auspice, frontispiece, etc.] 1. An appearance or representation to the senses or the perceptive faculties; an image presented to the eye or the mind. According to the Roman Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, the species, the outward and visible forms or the appearance of bread and wine in the eucharist, are the accidents only of bread and wine severally, the substance no longer existing after consecration. See intentional species, below.

The sun, the great eye of the world, prying into the recesses of rocks and the hollowness of valleys, receives species or visible forms from these objects.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 782.

Wit . . . is no other than the faculty of imagination in the writer, which searches over all the memory for the species or ideas of those things which it designs to represent. Dryden.

By putting such a rubric into its Missal, the church of Milan sought to express nothing more than that the accidents or species of the sacrament are broken.
Rock, Church of our Fathers, i. 125.

2†. Something to be seen or looked at; a spectacle or exhibition; a show.

Shows and species serve best with the people. Bacon.

3. [Tr. of Gr. εἶδος.] In logic, and hence in ordinary language, a class included under a higher class, or, at least, not considered as including lower classes; a kind; a sort; a number of individuals having common characters peculiar to them.

Ther is a privee spece of pride that waiteth first to be salewed er he wol salewe. Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

Different essences alone . . . make different species.
Locke, Human Understanding, III. vi. 35.

It is well for thee that . . . we came under a convention to pardon every species of liberty which we may take with each other. Scott, Redgauntlet, letter iii.

A poor preacher being the worst possible species of a poor man. W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 222.

4. One of the kinds of things constituting a combined aggregate or a compound; a distinct constituent part or element; an instrumental means: as, the species of a compound medicine. [Now rare in this medical sense, and obsolete or archaic in others.]

In Algebra, Species are those Letters, Characters, Notes, or Marks which represent the Quantities in any Equation or Demonstration.
E. Phillips, New World of Words (ed. 1706).

5. In biol., that which is specialized or differentiated recognizably from anything else of the same genus, family, or order; an individual which differs, or collectively those individuals which differ, specifically from all the other members of the genus, etc., and which do not differ from one another in size, shape, color, and so on, beyond the limits of (actual or assumed) individual variability, as those animals and plants which stand in the direct relation of parent and offspring, and perpetuate certain inherited characters intact or with that little modification which is due to conditions of environment. Species is thus practically, and for purposes of classification, the middle term between genus on the one hand and individual (or specimen) on the other; and only the latter can be said in strictness to have material existence, so that species, like genus, etc., is in this sense an abstract conception. It is also an assured fact in biology that no given stock or lineage breeds perfectly true in all its individuals; the line of descent is always marked by modification of characters (due to the interaction between heredity and environment); the whole tendency of such modification is toward further specialization, in the preservation of the more useful and the extinction of the less useful or the useless characters, and thus to the gradual acquirement, by insensible increments, of differences impressed upon a plastic organism from without—which is as much as to say that new species have always been in process of evolution, and still continue to be so developed. (See biological senses of evolution, selection, survival, and variation.) Such evolution has in fact been arrested at some point for every species once existent whose members have perished in time past; and of those specific forms whose adaptation to their environment has fitted them to survive till the present some are tending to perpetuation and some to extinction, but all are subject to incessant modification, for better or worse. (See atavism, reversion, 2, retrograde, a., 3, degradation, 7, 8, and parasitism, 2.) Such are the views taken by nearly all biologists of the present day, in direct opposition to the former opinion of a special creation, which proceeded upon the assumption that all species of animals and plants, such as we find them actually to be, came into existence by creative fiat at some one time, and have since been perpetuated with little if any modification. In consequence of the fact that the greatest as well as the least differences in organisms are of degree and not of kind, no rigorous and unexceptionable definition of species is possible in either the animal or the vegetable kingdom; and in the actual naming, characterizing, and classifying of species naturalists differ widely, some reducing to one or two species the same series of individuals which others describe as a dozen or twenty species. (See lumper, 3, splitter, 2.) This, however, is rather a nomenclatural than a doctrinal difference. The difficulty of deciding in many cases, and the impossibility of deciding in some, what degree of difference between given specimens shall be considered specific, and so formally named in the binomial system, have led to the introduction of several terms above and below the species (see *subgenus, subspecies, conspecies, variety, race*3, 5 (a) (b), intergrade, v. i.), and also to a modification of the binomial nomenclature (see polynomial, 2, and trinomial). Two tests are commonly applied to the discrimination between good species and mere subspecies or varieties: (1) the individuals of thoroughly distinct species do not interbreed, or, if they are near enough to hybridize, their progeny is usually infertile, so that the cross is not in perpetuity: the horse and ass offer a good case in point; (2) the specific distinctions do not vanish by insensible degrees when large series of specimens from different geographical localities or geological horizons are available for comparison; for, should characters assumed to be distinctive, and therefore specific, be found to grade away under such scrutiny, they are by that fact proved to be non-specific, and the specimens in question are reducible to the rank of conspecies, subspecies, varieties, or races. Attempts which have been made to separate mankind into several species of the genus Homo fail according to both of the criteria above stated. To these may be added, in judging the validity of an alleged species, the third premise, that stable specific forms are evolved by or in the course of natural selection only; for all the countless stocks or breeds resulting from artificial selection, however methodically conducted, tend to revert when left to themselves, and also hybridize freely; they are not therefore in perpetuity except under cultivation, and are no species in a proper sense, though their actual differences may have become, under careful selection, far greater than those usually accounted specific or even generic. (See *dog, rose*1.) Taking into account geological succession in time as well as geographical distribution in space, and proceeding upon accepted doctrines of the evolution of all forms of animal and vegetable life from antecedent forms, it is evident, first, that "species" is predicable only by means of the "missing links" in the chains of genetic relationships; for, were all organisms that have ever existed before our eyes in their actual evolutionary sequences, we should find no gap or break in the whole series; but, secondly, that development along numberless diverging lines of descent with modification has in fact resulted (through obliteration of the consecutive steps in the process) in the living fauna and flora of the globe, in respect of which not only specific, but generic, ordinal, and still broader distinctions are easily and certainly predicable. It does not appear that any animal or plant has always maintained what we now find its specific character to be; yet the persistence of some forms under no greater variation than that usually accounted generic is established, as in the case of the genus Lingula, whose members have survived from the Silurian to the present epoch with only specific modification. In the animal kingdom probably about 250,000 species have been described, recorded, and formally named by a word following the name of the genus to which they are severally ascribed (see under specific); the actual number of species is doubtless much greater than this; some 200,000 species are insects (see Insecta), of which 80,000 or more belong to one order (see Coleoptera). These estimates are exclusive of merely nominal species. (See synonym.) The known species of flowering plants are summed up by Durand in his "Index Genernm Phanerogamorum" as follows: dicotyledons, 78,200; monocotyledons, 19,600; gymnosperms, 2,420—in all, 100,220. This is the net result after extensive sifting. To this number large additions are to be expected from regions, as central Africa, still imperfectly or not at all explored. Of the number of cryptogams no reliable estimate can at present be given. The described species of fungi, judging from the eight volumes of Saccardo's work now published, are likely to number, before sifting, about 50,000. Abbreviated sp., with plural spp.

6†. Coin; metallic money; specie. See specie.

Rome possessed a much greater proportion of the circulating species of its time than any European city.
Arbuthnot, Ancient Coins.

Species, your honour knows, is of easier conveyance.
Garrick, Neck or Nothing, ii. 2.

He [Necker] affirms that, from the year 1726 to the year 1784, there was coined at the mint of France, in the species of gold and silver, to the amount of about one hundred millions of pounds sterling. Burke, Rev. in France.

7. One of a class of pharmaceutical preparations consisting of a mixture of dried herbs of analogous medicinal properties, used for making decoctions, infusions, etc. See under tea. —8. In civil law, the form or shape given to materials; fashion; form; figure. Burrill. —9. In math.: (a) A letter in algebra denoting a quantity. [This meaning was borrowed by some early writers from the French of Viète, who derived it from a Latin translation of Diophantus, who uses εἶδος to mean a term of a polynomial in a particular power of the unknown quantity.] (b) A fundamental operation of arithmetic. See the four species, below.—Disjunct species, in logic. See disjunct.—Intelligible species. See intentional species.—Intentional species, a similitude or simulacrum of an outward thing; the vicarious object in perception and thought, according to the doctrine held and attributed to Aristotle by the mediæval realists, beginning with Aquinas. Such species were divided into sensible species and intelligible species, which distinction and terminology, originating with Aquinas, were accepted by Scotus and others. The sensible species mediated between the outward object and the senses. They were metaphorically called emanations, but, being devoid of matter, are not to be confounded with the emanations of Democritus, from which they also differ in being related to other senses besides sight. So far as they belong to the outward thing they were called impressed, so far as they are perceived by the mind expressed species. From these sensible species the agent intellect, by an act of abstraction, was supposed to separate certain intelligible species, which the higher or patient intellect was able to perceive. These intelligible species so far as they belong to sense were called impressed, so far as they are perceived by the intellect expressed species. Species were further distinguished as acquired, infused, and connatural. The doctrine of intentional species was rejected by the nominalists, and exploded early in the seventeenth century, but not until the nineteenth was it generally acknowledged to be foreign to the opinion of Aristotle. —Nascent species, in biol., a species of animal or plant in the act, as it were, of being born or produced; an incipient species, whose characters are not yet established in the course of its development.—Sensible species. See intentional species.—Species anthelminticæ, a mixture of equal parts of absinthium, tansy, camomile, and santonica.—Species diureticæ, a mixture of equal parts of roots of lovage, asparagus, fennel, parsley, and butcher's-broom.—Species laxantes. Same as St. Germain tea (which see, under tea).—Species pectorales. Same as breast tea (which see, under tea).—Species sudorificæ. Same as wood tea (which see, under tea). —Subaltern species, in logic, that which is both a species of some higher genus and a genus in respect of the species into which it is divided.—The four species, the four fundamental operations of arithmetic—addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division. This phrase, rare in English but common in German, seems to have been first so applied by the East Frisian mathematician Gemma in 1540. It was borrowed from logic, where since Petrus Hispanus four species of logical procedure are enumerated in all the old books. Thus, Wilson (1551) says: "There be fower kindes of argumentes, a perfeicte argument, an unperfeicte argument, an inductione, an example"; and Blundeville (1599): "There bee foure principall kindes or formes of argumentation, that is, a syllogisme, an induction, an enthymeme, and example."

species-cover (spē′shēz-kuv″ėr), n. The cover used in a herbarium to inclose and protect all the species-sheets of a single species. Such covers are usually made of folded sheets of light-weight brown paper, a little larger than the species-sheets.

species-cycle (spē′shēz-sī″kl), n. In bot., the complete series of forms needed to represent adequately the entire life-history of a species.

species-monger (spē′shēz-mung″gėr), n. In nat. hist.: (a) One who occupies himself mainly or exclusively in naming and describing species, without inclination to study, or perhaps without ability to grasp, their significance as biological facts; a specialist in species, who cares little or nothing for broader generalizations. (b) One who is finical in drawing up specific diagnoses, or given to distinctions without a difference. [Cant in both senses.]

species-paper (spē′shēz-pā″pėr), n. Same as species-sheet.

species-sheet (spē′shēz-shēt), n. One of the sheets or pieces of paper upon which the individual specimens of a species in a herbarium are mounted for preservation and display. They are usually made of heavy stiff white paper, the standard size of which is, in the United States, 16½ × 11½ inches, weighing about 28 pounds to the ream. Only a single species is placed on a sheet, and its label is placed in the lower right-hand corner.

specifiable (spes′i-fī-a-bl), a. [< specify + -able.] That may be specified; capable of being distinctly named or stated.

A minute but specifiable fraction of an original disturbance may be said to get through any obstacle.
Nature, XXXVIII. 592.

specific (spē-sif′ik), a. and n. [< OF. specifique, F. spécifique = Sp. especifico = Pg. especifico = It. specifico (cf. G. spezifisch), < ML. specificus, specific, particular, < L. species, kind, + -ficus, < facere, make.] I. a. 1. That is specified or defined; distinctly named, formulated, or determined; of a special kind or a definite tenor; determinate; explicit: as, a specific sum of money; a specific offer; specific obligations or duties; a specific aim or pursuit.

To be actuated by a desire for pleasure is to be actuated by a desire for some specific pleasure to be enjoyed by oneself. T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 282.

In addition to these broad differences, there are finer differences of specific quality within each sense.
J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 115.

2. Pertaining to or accordant with what is specified or determined; relating to or regarding a definite subject; conformable to special occasion or requirement, prescribed terms, or known conditions; having a special use or application.

It was in every way stimulating and suggestive to have detected a specific bond of relationship in speech and in culture between such different peoples as the English and the Hindus. J. Fiske, Evolutionist, p. 109.

3. Of or pertaining to a species. (a) Pertaining to a logical species. (b) In zoöl. and bot., of or pertaining to species or a species; constituting a species; peculiar to, characteristic of, or diagnostic of a species; designating or denominating a species; not generic or of wider application than to a species: as, specific characters; specific difference; a specific name. See generic, subgeneric, conspecific, subspecific.

4. Peculiar; special.

Their style, like the style of Boiardo in poetry, of Botticelli in painting, is specific to Italy in the middle of the fifteenth century. J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 251.

5. In law, having a certain or well-defined form or designation; observing a certain form; precise. —6. In med., related to special infection, particularly syphilitic infection; produced by some distinct zymotic poison.—Specific cause, in med., a cause which in operation will produce some special disease.—Specific centers, points or periods in the course of evolution at which an organism is supposed to become specifically differentiated from a common stock, having assumed or acquired its specific characters.—Specific characters, in zoöl. and bot., the diagnostic marks of a species; differences, of whatever kind, which are peculiar to a species and serve to distinguish it from any other. The sum of such characters, or the total specific characteristics, are also spoken of as the specific character. Any one such mark or feature is a specific character.—Specific denial, in law, denial which itself rehearses what is denied, or which sufficiently specifies what particular part of the adversary's allegations are denied, as distinguished from a general denial of all his allegations.—Specific difference, in logic. See difference.—Specific disease, a disease produced by a special infection, as syphilis.—Specific duty, in a tariff, an impost of specified amount upon any object of a particular kind, or upon a specified quantity of a commodity, entered at a custom-house.—Specific gravity. See gravity.—Specific heat. See heat.—Specific inductive capacity. See capacity and induction, 6.—Specific intent, legacy, lien. See the nouns.—Specific medicine or remedy, a medicine or remedy that has a distinct effect in the cure of a certain disease, as mercury in syphilis, or quinine in intermittent fever.—Specific name, in zoöl. and bot., the second term in the binomial name of an animal or a plant, which designates or specifies a member of a genus, and which is joined to the generic name to complete the scientific or technical designation. Thus, in the name Felis leo, leo is the specific name, designating the lion as a member of the genus Felis, and as specifically different from Felis tigris, the tiger, Felis catus, the wildcat, etc. Also called nomen specificum, and formerly nomen triviale or trivial name. See binomial, 2, and nomen.—Specific performance, relief, resistance. See the nouns.—Specific rotatory power. See rotatory.—Syn. 1 and 2. Particular, etc. See special.

II. n. Something adapted or expected to produce a specific effect; that which is, or is supposed to be, capable of infallibly bringing about a desired result; especially, a remedy which cures, or tends to cure, a certain disease, whatever may be its manifestations, as mercury used as a remedy for syphilis.

Always you find among people, in proportion as they are ignorant, a belief in specifics, and a great confidence in pressing the adoption of them.
H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 20.

specifical (spē-sif′i-kal), a. [< specific + -al.] Same as specific. [Archaic.]

To compel the performance of the contract, and recover the specifical sum due. Blackstone, Com., III. ix.

specifically (spē-sif′i-kal-i), adv. 1. In a specific manner; according to the nature of the species or of the case; definitely; particularly; explicitly; in a particular sense, or with a particularly differentiated application.

But it is rather manifest that the essence of spirits is a substance specifically distinct from all corporeal matter whatsoever. Dr. H. More, Antidote against Atheism, iii. 12.

Those several virtues that are specifically requisite to a due performance of this duty. South, Sermons.

2. With reference to a species, or to specific difference; as a species.

specificalness (spē-sif′i-kal-nes), n. The state of being specifical. [Rare.]

specificate† (spē-sif′i-kāt), v. t. [< ML. specificatus, pp. of specificare, specify: see specify.] To denote or distinguish specifically; specify.

Now life is the character by which Christ specificates and denominates himself. Donne, Sermons, vii.

specification (spes″i-fi-kā′shon), n. [= F. spécification = Sp. especificacion = Pg. especificação = It. specificazione, < ML. specificatio(n-), a specifying, enumeration, < specificare, specify: see specify.] 1. An act of specifying, or making a detailed statement, or the statement so made; a definite or formal mention of particulars: as, a specification of one's requirements.

All who had relatives or friends in this predicament were required to furnish a specification of them.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., i. 7.

2. An article, item, or particular specified; a special point, detail, or reckoning upon which a claim, an accusation, an estimate, a plan, or an assertion is based: as, the specifications of an architect or an engineer, of an indictment, etc.; the specification of the third charge against a prisoner; statements unsupported by specifications. —3. The act of making specific, or the state of having a specific character; reference to or correlation with a species or kind; determination of species or specific relation.

For, were this the method, miracles would no more be miracles than the diurnal revolution of the sun, the growth and specification of plants and animals, the attraction of the magnet, and the like.
Evelyn, True Religion, II. 195.

Here we may refer to two principles which Kant put forward under the names of Homogeneity and Specification. F. H. Bradley, Ethical Studies, p. 68.

4. In patent law, the applicant's description of the manner of constructing and using his invention. It is required to be so explicit as to enable any person skilled in the art or science to make and use the same; and in the United States it forms part of the patent, which cannot therefore protect the inventor in anything not within the specification.

5. In civil law, the formation of a new property from materials belonging to another person. Specification exists where a person works up materials belonging to another into something which must be taken to be a new substance—for example, where whisky is made from corn. The effect is that the owner of the materials loses his property in them, and has only an action for the value of them against the person by whom they have been used. The doctrine originates in the civil law, but has been adopted by the common law, under the name of confusion and accession, at least where the person making the specification acts in good faith.—Accusative of specification. Same as synecdochical accusative. See synecdochical.—Charge and specifications. See charge.—Law of specification, in Kantian philos., the logical principle that, however far the process of logical determination may be carried, it can always be carried further.—Principle of specification, in Kantian philos.: (a) The logical maxim that we should be careful to introduce into a hypothesis all the elements which the facts to be explained call for, or that entium varietates non temere esse minuendas, which is a counteracting maxim to Occam's razor. (b) Same as law of specification.

specificity (spes-i-fis′i-ti), n. [< specific + -ity.] The state of being specific, or of having a specific character or relation; specific affinity, cause, origin, or effect; specificness. [Recent.]

The suddenness, vigour, and specificity of their effects.
F. W. H. Myers, Proc. Lond. Soc. Psychic Research.

Are we any longer to allow to this disease [cowpox] any high degree of specificity? Lancet, 1889, I. 1130.

specificize (spē-sif′i-sīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. specificized, ppr. specificizing. [< specific + -ize.] To make specific; give a special or specific character to. [Recent.]

The richest specificized apparatus of nervous mechanism. Alien. and Neurol., VI. 483.

specificness (spē-sif′ik-nes), n. The state or character of being specific.

specify (spes′i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. specified, ppr. specifying. [< ME. specyfyen, specifien, < OF. specifier, especifier, F. spécifier = Pr. Sp. Pg. especificar = It. specificare = D. specificeren = G. specificiren = Sw. specificera = Dan. specificere, < ML. specificare, make specific, mention specifically, < specificus, specific, particular: see specific.] 1. To mention specifically or explicitly; state exactly or in detail; name distinctly: as, to specify the persons concerned in a given act; to specify one's wants, or articles required.

Ther cowde no man the nowmber specifie.
Generydes (E. E. T. S.), l. 1953.

I nevere hadde to do more with the aeyd John Wortes than is specified in the aeyd inatruccion.
Paston Letters, I. 20.

There is no need of specifying particulars in this class of uaes. Emerson, Nature, p. 17.

2. To name as a requisite, as in technical specifications; set down in a specification.—3. To make specific; give a specific character to; distinguish as of a species or kind. [Rare.]

Be specified in yonrself, but not specified by anything foreign to yourself. F. H. Bradley, Ethical Studies, p. 71.

=Syn. To indicate, particularize, individualize.

specillum (spē-sil′um), n.; pl. specilla (-ä). [L., < specere, look, behold: see species.] 1. In med., a probe.—2. A lens; an eye-glass.

specimen (spes′i-men), n. [= F. spécimen = Sp. especimen, < L. specimen, that by which a thing is known, a mark, token, proof, < specere, see: see species.] 1. A part or an individual taken as exemplifying a whole mass or number; something that represents or illustrates all of its kind; an illustrative example: as, a collection of geological specimens; a wild specimen of the human or of the feline race; a specimen page of a book (a page shown as a specimen of what the whole is or is to be); a specimen copy of a medal.

The best specimens of the Attic coinage give a weight of 4.366 grammes (67.38+ grains Troy) for the drachma.
Trans. Amer. Philol. Ass., XVI. 117.

Curzola is a perfect specimen of a Venetian town.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 205.

The leaf sculpture of the door jambs of the Cathedral of Florence affords specimens of the best Italian work of this sort [fourteenth century].
C. H. Moore, Gothic Architecture, p. 296.

2. In zoöl. and bot., an individual animal or plant, or some part of one, prepared and preserved for scientific examination; an example of a species or other group; a preparation: as, a specimen of natural history; a specimen of the dog or the rose. Abbreviated sp. and spec.—3. A typical individual; one serving as a specially striking or exaggerated example of the kind indicated. [Jocose and colloq.]

There were some curious specimens among my visitors.
Thoreau, Walden, p. 163.

=Syn. Specimen, Sample. A specimen is a part of a larger whole employed to exhibit the nature or kind of that of which it forms a part, without reference to the relative quality of individual portions; thus, a cabinet of mineralogical specimens exhibits the nature of the rocks from which they are broken. A sample is a part taken out of a quantity, and implies that the quality of the whole is to be judged by it, and not rarely that it is to be used as a standard for testing the goodness, genuineness, or purity of the whole, and the like. In many cases, however, the words are used indifferently. Sample is more often used in trade: as, a sample of cotton or coffee.

speciological (spē″shi-ō-loj′i-kal), a. [< speciology + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to speciology.

speciology (spē-shi-ol′ō-ji), n. [< L. species, species, + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] In biol., the science of species; the doctrine of the origin and nature of species.

speciosity (spē-shi-os′i-ti), n.; pl. speciosities (-tiz). [< OF. speciosité = Sp. especiosidad = Pg. especiosidade = It. speziosità, < LL. speciosita(t-)s, good looks, beauty, < L. speciosus, good-looking, beautiful, splendid: see specious.] 1†. The state of being specious or beautiful; a beautiful show or spectacle; something delightful to the eye.

So great a glory as all the speciosities of the world could not equalise.
Dr. H. More, On Godliness, III. vi. § 5. (Encyc. Dict.)

2. The state of being specious or plausible; a specious show; a specious person or thing. [Rare.]

Professions built so largely on speciosity instead of performance. Carlyle.

specious (spē′shus), a. [< ME. specious, < OF. specieux, F. spécieux = Sp. Pg. especioso = It. spezioso, < L. speciosus, good-looking, beautiful, fair, < species, form, figure, beauty: see species.] 1. Pleasing to the eye; externally fair or showy; appearing beautiful or charming; sightly; beautiful. [Archaic.]

The rest, far greater part,
Will deem in outward rites and specious forms Religion satisfied. Milton, P. L., xii. 534.

2. Superficially fair, just, or correct; appearing well; apparently right; plausible; beguiling: as, specious reasoning; a specious argument; a specious person or book.

Thou specious Head without a Brain. Prior, A Fable.

He coined
A brief yet specious tale, how I had wasted
The sum in secret riot. Shelley, The Cenci, iii. 1.

3. Appearing actual, or in reality; actually existing; not imaginary. [Rare.]

Let me sum up, now, by saying that we are constantly conscious of a certain duration — the specious present — varying in length from a few seconds to probably not more than a minute, and that this duration (with its content perceived as having one part earlier and the other part later) is the original intuition of time.
W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 642.

4†. Pertaining to species or a species.—Specious arithmetic, algebra: so called by old writers following Viète. The phrase implies that algebra is computation by means of species, or letters denoting quantities; but the choice of the name was probably influenced by the beauty of algebraic processes.—Specious logistic. See logistic.

=Syn. 2. Colorable, Plausible, etc. See ostensible.

speciously (spē′shus-li), adv. In a specious manner; with an appearance of fairness or of reality; with show of right: as, to reason speciously.

My dear Anacreon, you reason speciously, which is better in most cases than reasoning soundly; for many are led by it and none offended.
Landor, Imag. Conv., Anacreon and Polyeratea.

speciousness (spē′shus-nes), n. The state or quality of being specious; plausible appearance; fair external show: as, the speciousness of an argument.

5. pl. A pair of lenses set in a frame adjusted to the eyes, to correct or improve defective vision; also, sometimes, a similar frame with pieces of plain white or colored glass to protect the eyes from glare or dust: commonly called a pair of spectacles. The frame was in former times usually of horn or tortoise-shelt, and afterward of Spectacles.

A, spectacles with bows hinged to the shoulders on the rims connected by the nose or bridge. B, spectacles with hook-bows and with bridge and shoulders riveted to the lenses. C, detail showing construction of shoulder. D, side view, showing rim. In all the figures: a, bows; b, shoulders; c, rims; d, bridge.

silver; it is now usually of steel or of gold. It is made up of the "bridge," "rims" (or frames of the lenses), "bows," and "sides" or "temples"; but the bows are now often omitted. The frame is so constructed and adjusted as to rest on the nose and ears and hold the lenses in the proper position. Spectacles which are supported on the nose only, by means of a spring, are commonly called eye-glasses. Spectacles with convex lenses are for the aged, or far-sighted; and spectacles with concave lenses are for the near-sighted. In both cases the value of spectacles depends upon their being accurately adapted to the person's vision. Spectacles with colored lenses, as green, blue, neutral-tint, or smoke-color, are used to protect the eyes from a glare of light. Divided spectacles have each lens composed of two parts of different foci neatly united, one part for observing distant objects, and the other for examining objects near the eye. Another kind, called periscopic spectacles, are intended to allow the eyes considerable latitude of motion without fatigue. The lenses employed in this case are of either a meniscus or a concavo-convex form, the concave side being turned to the eye. Spectacles with glazed wings or frames partly filled with crape or wire gauze are used to shield the eyes from dust, etc.

He [Lord Crawford] sat upon a couch covered with deer's hide, and with spectacles on his nose (then a recent invention) was laboring to read a huge manuscript called the Rosier de la Guerre. Scott, Quentin Durward, vii.

6. pl. Figuratively, visual aids of any kind, physical or mental; instruments of or assistance in seeing or understanding; also, instruments or means of seeing or understanding otherwise than by natural or normal vision or perception: as, rose-colored spectacles; I cannot see things with your spectacles.

And even with this I lost fair England's view,
And bid mine eyes be packing with my heart,
And call'd them blind and dusky spectacles,
For losing ken of Albion's wished coast.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 2. 112.

Subjects are to look upon the faults of princes with the spectacles of obedience and reverence to their place and persons. Donne, Sermons, ii.

Shakespeare . . . was naturally learn'd; he needed not the Spectacles of Books to read Nature; he look'd inwards, and found her there.
Dryden, Essay on Dram. Poesy (1693), p. 31.

7. pl. In zoöl., a marking resembling a pair of spectacles, especially about the eyes: as, the spectacles of the cobra. See cut under cobra-de-capello.

A pair of white spectacles on the eyes, and whitish about base of bill. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 815.

Compound spectacles. (a) Spectacles fitted for receiving extra colored glasses, or to which additional lenses can be attached to vary the power. (b) A form of spectacles having in each bow two half glasscs differing in power or character; divided spectacles. See def. 5.—Franklin spectacles. Same as pantoscopic spectacles (which see, under pantoscopic).

spectacled (spek′tạ-kld), a. [< spectacle + -ed[2].] 1. Furnished with or wearing spectacles.

The bleared sights
Are spectacled to see him. Shak., Cor., ii. 1. 222.

Porphyro upon her face doth look,
Like puzzled urchin on an aged crone
Who keepeth closed a wondrous riddle-book,
As spectacled she sits in chimney-nook.
Keats, Eve of St. Agnes, xv.

2. In zoöl.: (a) Marked in any way that suggests spectacles or the wearing of spectacles: as, the spectacled bear or cobra. Pg. espectro = It. spettro, an image, figure, ghost, < L. spectrum, a vision, appearance, apparition, image, < specere, see: see species, spectacle. Cf. spectrum.] 1. A ghostly apparition; a visible incorporeal human spirit; an appearance of the dead as when living. Specters are imagined as disembodied spirits haunting or revisiting the scenes of their mundane life, and showing themselves in intangible form to the living, generally at night, from some overpowering necessity, or for some benevolent or (more usually) malevolent purpose. They are sometimes represented as speaking, but more commonly as only using terrifying or persuasive gestures to induce compliance with their wishes. The word is rarely used for the dissociated soul of a living person.

The ghosts of traitors from the Bridge descend,
With bold fanatic spectres to rejoice.
Dryden, Annus Mirabilis, st. 223.

One of the afflicted,
I know, bore witness to the apparition
Of ghosts unto the spectre of this Bishop, Saying, "You murdered us!"
Longfellow, Giles Corey, iii. 2.

A fine traditional spectre pale,
With a turnip head and a ghostly wail,
And a splash of blood on the dickey!
W. S. Gilbert, Haunted.

2. In zoöl.: (a) One of many names of gressorial orthopterous insects of the family Phasmidæ; a walking-stick or stick-insect; a specter-insect. (b) The specter-bat. (c) The specter-lemur. (d) A specter-shrimp.—Specter of the Brocken, an optical phenomenon named from the Brocken, a mountain of the Harz range, where it has been most frequently observed. It consists of the shadow of the observer cast at sunrise or sunset in apparently gigantic size upon the mist or fog about the mountain-summit. The shadow is sometimes inclosed in a prismatic circle called the Brocken bow, and again is bordered with a colored fringe. Howitt states that, if the fog is very dry, one sees not only one's self, but one's neighbor; if very damp, only one's self, surrounded by a rainbow-colored glory. Also Brocken specter.=Syn. 1. Apparition, Phantom, etc. See ghost.

specter-bat (spek′tėr-bat), n. The spectral bat, a South American leaf-nosed bat or vampire, Phyllostoma spectrum, or a similar species.

specter-candle (spek′tėr-kan″dl), n. A straight fossil cephalopod, as a baculite, belemnite, or orthoceratite. These and similar objects have often been superstitiously regarded, in ignorance of their origin and nature. See bætylus, sagagrama, and thunder-stone.

specter-crab (spek′tėr-krab), n. A glass-crab; one of the larval forms which were called Phyllosomata. See cut under glass-crab.

specter-insect (spek′tėr-in″sekt), n. Same as specter, 2 (a).

specter-lemur (spek′tėr-lē″mėr), n. The tarsier, Tarsius spectrum. See cut under tarsier.

specter-shrimp (spek′tėr-shrimp), n. A small læmodipod crustacean of the family Caprellidæ, as Caprella tuberculata; a skeleton-shrimp: so called from the singular form and aspect.

spectra, n. Plural of spectrum.

spectral (spek′tral), a. [= F. spectral, < L. spectrum, specter: see specter.] 1. Of or pertaining to a specter; resembling or having the aspect of a specter; ghostlike: ghostly.

Some of the spectral appearances which he had been told of in a winter's evening. Scott, Bride of Lammermoor, xiii.

To his excited fancy everything assumed a spectral look. The shadows of familiar things about him stalked like ghosts through the haunted chambers of his soul.
Longfellow, Hyperion, iv. 3.

Spectral in the river-mist
The ship's white timbers show.
Whittier, The Ship-builders.

2. Pertaining to ocular spectra, or pertaining to the solar, prismatic, or diffraction spectrum; exhibiting the hues of the prismatic spectrum; produced by the aid of the spectrum: as, spectral colors; spectral analysis.

It is important to be able to observe the varying effects of pressure and density upon spectral phenomena.
J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 75.

3. In zoöl., like or likened to a specter or apparition; suggestive of a ghost in any way: as, the spectral bat; spectral shrimps; spectral insects.—Spectral lemur, the tarsier.—Spectral owl, Syrnium cinereum, or Strix cinerea, the great gray owl of arctic America, remarkable for having more plumage in proportion to the size of the body than any other owl.

spectrality (spek-tral′i-ti), n.; pl. spectralities (-tiz). [< spectral + -ity.] The state of being spectral; a spectral being or object. [Rare.]

What is he doing here in inquisitorial sanbenito, with nothing but ghastly spectralities prowling round him?
Carlyle, Sterling, i. 1. (Davies.) spectrally (spek′tral-i), adv. In a spectral manner; like a ghost or specter.

spectre, n. See specter.

spectrobolometer (spek″trō-bō-lom′e-tėr), n. [< NL. spectrum, spectrum, + E. bolometer.] An instrument consisting of a bolometer in combination with a spectroscope, used in the study of the distribution of heat in the solar spectrum and in similar investigations. The absorbing surface of the bolometer is an extremely slender strip of platinum, and it is so mounted that this can be moved at will to any desired part of the spectrum, the amount of heat received being measured, as usual, by the deflection of a galvanometer-needle.

spectrograph (spek′trō-graf), n. [< NL. spectrum + Gr. γράφειν, write.] An apparatus designed to give a representation of the spectrum from any source, particularly one in which photography is employed; a spectroscope in which a sensitive photographic plate takes the place of the eyepiece of the observing telescope.

spectrographic (spek-trō-graf′ik), a. [< spectrograph + -ic.] Pertaining to a spectrograph or the observations made with it; specifically, relating to the process or results of photography as applied to the study of spectra.

Spectrographic operations are, as Professor Young well says, much more sensitive to atmospheric conditions than are visual observations. D. Todd, Science, III. 727.

spectrography (spek-trog′ra-fi), n. [As spectrograph + *-y*3.] The art of using the spectrograph.

spectrological (spek-trō-loj′i-kal), a. [< spectrology + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to spectrology; performed or determined by spectrology: as, spectrological analysis.

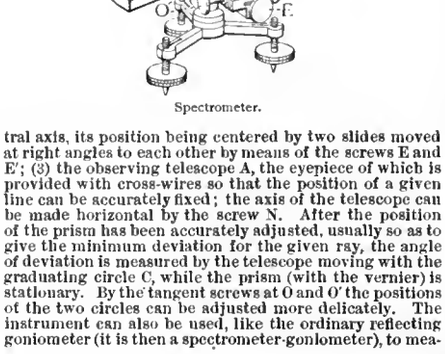
spectrology (spek-trol′ō-ji), n. [< NL. spectrum + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That branch of science which determines the constituent elements and other conditions of bodies by examination of their spectra.

spectrometer (spek-trom′e-tėr), n. [< NL. spectrum, spectrum, + L. metrum, measure.] An instrument used chiefly to measure the angular deviation of light-rays in passing through a prism, and hence to determine the refractive indices of the substance of which the prism is formed. Its essential parts are—(1) a tube B (see figure), having a slit at the further end through which the light is thrown by the mirror M, and a collimating lens at the other end to convert the divergent pencil into a parallel beam; (2) the prism P, which can be turned upon the central axis, its position being centered by two slides moved at right angles to each other by means of the screws E and E′; (3) the observing telescope A, the eyepiece of which is provided with cross-wires so that the position of a given line can be accurately fixed; the axis of the telescope can be made horizontal by the screw N. After the position of the prism has been accurately adjusted, usually so as to give the minimum deviation for the given ray, the angle of deviation is measured by the telescope moving with the graduating circle C, while the prism (with the vernier) is stationary. By the tangent screws at O and O′ the positions of the two circles can be adjusted more delicately. The instrument can also be used, like the ordinary reflecting goniometer (it is then a spectrometer-goniometer), to measure the angle between the two faces of the prism, which angle, with that of the minimum deviation, is needed to give the data for calculating the required refractive index. (See refraction.) If a diffraction-grating instead of a prism is employed, the telescope A is moved into the position A′, making a small angle with the tube B; the instrument may then be used to measure the wave-length of a given light-ray.



Spectrometer.

spectrometric (spek-trō-met′rik), a. [As spectrometer + -ic.] Pertaining to a spectrometer or the observations made with it.

spectromicroscopical (spek-trō-mī-krō-skop′i-kal), a. [< NL. spectrum + E. microscopical.] Pertaining to spectroscopic observations made in connection with the microscope.

The spectro-microscopical apparatus, especially in the hands of botanists, has become an important instrument in the investigation of the coloring matter of plants.
Behrens, Micros. in Botany (trans.), ii. 139.

spectrophone (spek′trō-fōn), n. [< NL. spectrum + Gr. φωνή, sound.] An adaptation of the principle of the radiophone, devised by Bell to be used in spectrum analysis. It consists of a spectroscope the eyepiece of which is removed—the sensitive substances being placed in the focal point behind an opaque diaphragm containing a slit, while the ear is in communication with the substances by means of a hearing-tube. See the quotation.

Suppose we smoke the interior of our spectrophonic receiver, and fill the cavity with peroxide of nitrogen gas. We have then a combination that gives us good sounds in all parts of the spectrum (visible and invisible) except the ultra violet. Now pass a rapidly interrupted beam of light through some substances whose absorptive spectrum is to be investigated, and bands of sound and silence are observed in exploring the spectrum, the silent positions corresponding to the absorption bands.
A. G. Bell, in Philosoph. Mag., 5th ser., II. 527, 1881.

spectrophonic (spek-trō-fon′ik), a. [As spectrophone + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the spectrophone, or investigations made by means of it.

spectrophotometer (spek″trō-fō-tom′e-tėr), n. [< NL. spectrum + E. photometer.] An instrument used to compare the intensities of two spectra (as from the limb and center of the sun), or the intensity of a given color with that of the corresponding color in a standard spectrum. It is based upon the fact that the eye is very sensitive to slight differences of intensity between two similar colors when brought side by side. It consists essentially of a spectroscope arranged with total reflecting prisms, so that, for example, the spectra to be compared can be brought into immediate juxtaposition, while Nicol prisms in the path of the pencil of rays make it possible to diminish the intensity of the brighter light until the two exactly correspond. The angular position of the analyzing prism gives the means of deducing the required relation in intensity.

spectrophotometric (spek-trō-fō-tō-met′rik), a. [As spectrophotometer + -ic.] Pertaining to the spectrophotometer, to its use, or to observations made with it.

spectrophotometry (spek″trō-fō-tom′e-tri), n. [As spectrophotometer + *-y*3.] The art of using the spectrophotometer.

spectropolariscope (spek″trō-pō-lar′i-skōp), n. [< NL. spectrum + E. polariscope.] A combination of the spectroscope and the polariscope, an instrument sometimes used in the analysis of sugar. It is a modification of a form of the saccharimeter.

spectropyrometer (spek″trō-pī-rom′e-tėr), n. [< NL. spectrum + E. pyrometer.] An instrument devised by Crova for measuring high temperatures, based upon the principle that two incandescent bodies of the same radiating power have the same temperature when their spectra are identical in extent. It is essentially a form of spectrophotometer.

spectroscope (spek′trō-skōp), n. [< NL. spectrum + Gr. σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument used to produce a spectrum of the light (or, more generally, the radiation) from any source by the passage of the rays through a prism or their reflection from a grating, and for the study of the spectrum so formed. In its common form the essential parts of the prismatic spectroscope are—(1) a tube with a slit at the further end (see fig. 1), through which the light enters, and at the other end a collimating lens which brings the rays into a parallel beam (the slit is formed between two parallel edges the distance between which can be varied at will); (2) a prism to refract and disperse the rays, or a series or train of prisms when greater dispersion is desired—a gain, however, which is accompanied by a serious diminution in the intensity of the light; (3) a telescope through which the magnified image of the spectrum thus formed is viewed. A third tube is usually added, containing a scale, which is illuminated by a small gas-flame and reflected from the surface of the prism into the telescope, thus giving the means of fixing the position of the lines observed. A small glass comparison prism is often placed in front of half the slit, and through it, by total reflection, a second beam of light can be introduced, the spectrum of which is seen directly over the other. An instrument which gives a spectrum when the source of the light is in a straight line with the eye—that is, which gives dispersion without deviation—is called a direct-vision spectroscope (see

fig. 2); this may be accomplished by combining two crown-glass prisms, with a third flint-glass prism of an angle of Spectroscopes.

90° between them (fig. 3). For certain rays—for example, the yellow—there is no divergence while a spectrum is obtained, since the dispersion of the flint-glass prism in one direction is greater than that of the two crown-glass prisms in the opposite direction. Other forms of direct-vision spectroscope have also been devised. In the grating spectroscope, or diffraction spectroscope, a diffraction-grating (a series of very fine parallel lines ruled on glass or speculum-metal) takes the place of the prism; and the parallel rays falling upon it are reflected, and form a series of diffraction-spectra (see diffraction, *grating*2, 2, and interference, 5), which are called normal spectra (see spectrum, 3), since the dispersion of the rays is proportional to their wave-length. A prism is sometimes used before the telescope to separate parts of the successive spectra which would otherwise overlap. If a Rowland grating (see diffraction) is employed, the arrangements can be much simplified, since the large concave surface of the grating forms an image directly, which may be received upon a screen, or for study upon a photographic plate, or viewed through an eyepiece with cross-wires to fix the position of the lines observed. The grating is supported at one end of a rigid bar, in practice about 21 feet in length, at the other end of which, and at the center of curvature of the concave surface, is the eyepiece or support for the sensitive plate. The ends of this bar rest on carriages moving on two rails at right angles to each other; and, as the end carrying the eyepiece is moved, the whole length of the spectrum (several feet) may be successively observed, the fixed beam of parallel rays from the slit falling upon the grating as its position is slowly turned. The whole apparatus is mounted on rigid supports in a room from which all light but that received through the slit is carefully excluded. A high degree of dispersion is thus obtained, combined with the advantage of the normal spectrum, and the further advantages that the amount of light employed is large, while the disturbing effect of the absorption of the material of the prisms is avoided. See further under spectrum.—Analyzing spectroscope, integrating spectroscope, terms applied to the spectroscope (Young) to describe its use, with or without a lens throwing an image of the luminous object upon the slit. In the former case, different parts of the slit are illuminated by light from different parts of the object, and their spectra can be separately compared, or, in other words, the light is thus analyzed; while in the second case, when the collimator is pointed toward the source of light, the combined effect of the whole is obtained.—Half-prism spectroscope, a spectroscope in which the beam of rays enters the prism at right angles to one face, and suffers dispersion only on emerging from the face opposite and inclined to it. The half-prism ordinarily employed is half of a compound prism such as is used in the direct-vision spectroscope.—Rainband-spectroscope. See rainband.

spectroscope (spek′trō-skōp), r. i. and t.; pret. and pp. spectroscoped, ppr. spectroscoping. [< spectroscope, n.] To use the spectroscope; study by means of observations with the spectroscope. C. Piazzi Smyth, Trans. R. S. E., XXXII. 521. [Rare.]

spectroscopic (spek-trō-skop′ik), a. [< spectroscope + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or performed by means of the spectroscope or spectroscopy: as, spectroscopic analysis; spectroscopic investigations.

spectroscopical (spek-trō-skop′i-kal), a. [< spectroscopic + -al.] Same as spectroscopic.

spectroscopically (spek-trō-skop′i-kal-i), adv. In a spectroscopic manner; by the use of the spectroscope.

spectroscopist (spek′trō-skō-pist), n. [< spectroscope + -ist.] One who uses the spectroscope; one skilled in spectroscopy.

spectroscopy (spek′trō-skō-pi), n. [As spectroscope + *-y*3.] That branch of science, more particularly of chemical and physical science, which is concerned with the use of the spectroscope and with spectrum analysis.

spectrum (spek′trum), n.; pl. spectra (-trä). [< NL. spectrum, a spectrum, < L. spectrum, an appearance, an image or apparition: see specter.] 1†. A specter; a ghostly phantom.—2. An image of something seen, continuing after the eyes are closed, covered, or turned away. If, for example, one looks intently with one eye upon any colored object, such as a wafer placed on a sheet of white paper, and immediately afterward turns the same eye to another part of the paper, one sees a similar spot, but of a different color. Thus, if the wafer is red, the seeming spot will be green; if black, it will be changed into white. These images are also termed ocular spectra.

3. In physics, the continuous band of light (visible spectrum) showing the successive prismatic colors, or the isolated lines or bands of color, observed when the radiation from such a source as the sun, or an ignited vapor in a gas-flame, is viewed after having been passed through a prism (prismatic spectrum) or reflected from a diffraction-grating (diffraction- or interference-spectrum). The action of the prism (see prism and refraction) is to refract the light and at the same time to separate or disperse the rays of different wave-lengths, the refraction and dispersion being greater as the wave-length diminishes. The grating (see *grating*2, 2), which consists usually of a series of fine parallel lines (say 10,000 or 20,000 to the inch) ruled on speculum-metal, diffracts and at the same time disperses the light-rays, forming a series of spectra whose lengths depend upon the fineness of the lines. If, now, a beam of white light is passed through a slit, and then by a collimator lens is thrown upon a prism, and the light from this received upon a screen, a colored band will be obtained passing by insensible degrees, from the less refrangible end, the red, to the more refrangible end, the violet, through a series of colors ordinarily described as red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, and violet. A similar effect is obtained from a grating, with, however, this difference, that in the prismatic spectrum the red covers only a small part relatively of the colored band, since the action of the prism is to crowd together the less refrangible rays and separate the more refrangible rays of less wave-length, and thus distort the spectrum. The diffraction-spectrum, on the other hand, shows the red occupying about the same space as the blue and violet, and is called a normal spectrum. When the light from different sources is studied in the spectroscope, it is found, first, that a solid or a liquid when incandescent gives a continuous spectrum, and this is true of gases also at great pressures; second, bodies in the gaseous form give discontinuous spectra, consisting of colored bright lines (line-spectrum) or bands (band-spectrum), or of bands which under certain conditions appear as channeled spaces or flutings (fluted spectrum), and these lines or bands for a given substance have a definite position, and are hence characteristic of it; third, if light from an incandescent solid or liquid body passes through a gas (at a lower temperature than the incandescent body), the gas absorbs the same rays as those its own spectrum consists of; therefore, in this case, the result is a spectrum (absorption-spectrum) continuous, except as interrupted by black lines occupying the same position as the bright lines in the spectrum of the gas itself would occupy. An absorption-spectrum, showing more or less sharply defined dark bands, is also obtained when the light has passed through an appropriate liquid (as blood), or a solid such as a salt of didymium (see further under absorption). For example, the spectrum from a candle-flame is continuous, being due to the incandescent carbon particles suspended in the flame. If, however, the yellow flame produced when a little sodium is inserted in the non-luminous flame of a Bunsen burner is examined, a bright-yellow line is observed; if a red lithium flame, then a red and a yellow line are seen; the red strontium flame gives a more complex spectrum, consisting of a number of lines, chiefly in the red and yellow; and so of other similar substances. For substances like iron, and other metals not volatile except at very high temperatures, the heat of the voltaic arc is employed, and by this means their spectra, often consisting of a hundred or more lines (of iron at least 2,000), can be mapped out. Still again, if the light from the sun is studied in the same way, it is found to be a bright spectrum from red to violet, but crossed by a large number of dark lines called Fraunhofer lines, because, though earlier seen by Wollaston (1802), they were first mapped by Fraunhofer in 1814; this name is given especially to the more prominent of them, which he designated by the letters A to H, etc. (See the figures.) These lines, as explained above, are due to the absorption by gases, either in the sun's atmosphere or in that of the earth. When the light is passed through a train of prisms, or reflected from a Rowland grating, and thus a very high degree of dispersion obtained, the rays are more widely separated and the spectrum can be more minutely examined. Studied in this way, it is found that the dark lines in the solar spectrum number many thousands, the greater part of which can be identified in the spectra of known terrestrial substances. Thus, the presence in the sun's atmosphere of thirty-six elements has been established (Rowland, 1891); these include sodium, potassium, calcium, magnesium, iron, copper, cobalt, silver, lead, tin, zinc, titanium, aluminium, chromium, silicon, carbon, hydrogen, etc. The radiation from the sun consists not only of those rays whose wave-length is such as to produce the effect of vision upon the eye, but also of others of greater wave-length than the red rays and less wave-length than the violet; the spectrum from such a source consequently includes, besides the luminous part, an invisible part (invisible spectrum) below the red, called the infra-red region, and another beyond the violet, called the ultra-violet. The first region is also present in the spectrum from any hot body, and the latter in that from a body at a high temperature—for example the incandescent carbons of an arc electric light. Thus, Langley by means of his bolometer has proved the existence of rays having a wave-length nearly twenty times that of the luminous red rays, in the radiation of the surface of the moon, and corresponding to a temperature not far from that of melting ice. Further, while the visible spectrum includes rays separated by only about one octave (since the wave-length for the extreme red is approximately twice that of the extreme violet), the full spectrum, from the extreme ultra-violet to the longest waves recognized by the bolometer, embraces more than seven octaves. In other words, it extends from rays having a wave-length of 0.18 of a micron to those whose wave-length is 30 microns (1 micron = $\frac{1}{1000}$ millimeter). The invisible regions of the spectrum cannot be directly studied by the eye, but they can be explored, first by photography, it being possible to prepare suitable plates sensitive to the infra-red as well as others sensitive to ultra-violet rays, and such photographs show the presence of many additional absorption-lines. The invisible infra-red region (heat-spectrum) can also be explored by the thermopile and still better the bolometer, and the distribution of the heat thus examined, and a thermogram of the spectrum constructed in which the presence of "cold" absorption-bands is noted. Still again, the method of phosphorescence is employed to give a phosphorograph of the spectrum, while fluorescence is made use of in studying the ultra-violet region. In studying the invisible heat-spectrum lenses and prisms of rock-salt must be used, because the dark rays of long wave-length are largely absorbed by glass; further, in investigating the invisible ultra-violet region quartz is similarly employed, since it is highly transparent to these short wave-length vibrations. In many investigations it is of great advantage to use the grating-spectroscope, especially one provided with a concave Rowland grating, since then the normal spectrum (fig. II.) is obtained directly without the use of the usual lenses and prisms, and hence free from their absorbing effects. Recent photographs of the solar spectrum obtained by Prof. Rowland in this way give a clearness of definition combined with high dispersion never before approached. Thus, in their enlarged form as published (1890), the double sodium-lines are widely separated, and sixteen distinct fine lines may be counted between them. It was formerly the custom to divide the solar spectrum into three parts, formed by the invisible heat-rays, the luminous rays, and the so-called chemical or actinic rays. This threefold division of the spectrum is, however, largely erroneous, since all the rays of the spectrum are "heat-rays" if they are received upon an absorbing surface, as lampblack; and, while it is true that the chemical change upon which ordinary photography depends is most stimulated by the violet and ultra-violet rays, this is not true universally of all chemical changes produced by direct radiation. The rays from the lowest end of the spectrum to the highest differ intrinsically in wave-length only, and the difference of effect observed is due to the character of the surface upon which they fall. The spectra of the stars, of the comets, nebulæ, etc., can be studied in the same way as the solar spectrum, and the result has been to throw much light upon the constitution of these bodies; the spectrum of the aurora has been similarly examined. In addition to its use in the study of cosmical physics, spectrum analysis has proved a most delicate and invaluable method to the chemist and physicist in the examination of the different elements and their compounds. By this method of research a number of new elements have been detected (as rubidium, cæsium, indium, thallium); and recently the study of the absorption-spectra of the earths—obtained from samarskite, gadolinite, and other related minerals—has served to show the existence of a group of closely related elements whose existence had not before been suspected. Further, the study of the change in the spectra of certain elements under different conditions of temperature has led Lockyer to some most important and suggestive hypotheses as to the relation between them and their possible compound nature.

By using new kinds of glass which allow of proportional dispersion in different parts of the spectrum (see apochromatic), Abbe has made lenses which collect three colors to one focus, leaving only a small residual aberration uncorrected, which is called the tertiary spectrum.

specula, n. Plural of speculum.

speculable (spek′ū-la-bl), a. Knowable.

specular (spek′ū-lär), a. [= F. spéculaire = Pr. specular = Sp. Specularia (spek-ū-lā′ri-ą), n. [NL. (Heister, 1748), < L. speculum in speculum Veneris, 'Venus's looking-glass,' a medieval name of S. Speculum, from the resemblance of its flowers set on their cylindrical ovary to the ancient round bronze mirror at the end of a straight handle: see speculum.] A genus of gamopetalous plants of the order Campanulaceæ. It is distinguished from the allied genus Campanula by its wheel-shaped or shallow and broadly bell-shaped corolla and linear or narrowly oblong ovary. There are about 8 species, natives of the northern hemisphere, chiefly of southern and central Europe, with one in South America. They are annual herbs, either erect or decumbent, and smooth or bristly. They bear alternate entire or toothed leaves, and blue, violet, or white two-bracted flowers nearly or quite sessile in the axils. S. Speculum is the Venus's looking-glass, formerly a favorite in English gardens; S. hybrida is there known as the corn-violet; and S. perfoliata, native in the United States, is remarkable for its dimorphous flowers, the earlier being minute and cleistogamic.

Thou hast no speculation in those eyes
Which thou dost glare with.
Shak., Macbeth, iii. 4. 95.

I am arrived to that perfection in speculation that I understand the language of the eyes.
Steele, Spectator, No. 254.

2. The pursuit of truth by means of thinking, especially mathematical reasoning and logical analysis; meditation: deep and thorough consideration of a theoretical question. This use of the word, though closely similar to the application of speculatio in the Latin of Boëthius to translate θεωρία, is chiefly due to 1 Cor. xiii. 12, "now we see through a glass, darkly," where 'glass' is in the Vulgate speculum. But some writers, as Milton and Cowper, associate the meaning with specula, 'a watch-tower.'

For practise must agree with speculation, Belief & knowledge must guide operation.
Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 147.

Thenceforth to speculations high or deep
I turn'd my thoughts. Milton, P. L., ix. 602.

Join sense unto reason, and experiment unto speculation.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., ii. 5.

From him [Pythagoras] Socrates derived the principles of virtue and morality, . . . and most of his natural speculations. Sir W. Temple, Ancient and Modern Learning.

The brilliant fabric of speculation erected by Darwin can scarcely sustain its own weight.
Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 240.

3. In philos., sometimes, a purely a priori method of philosophizing: but commonly in philosophy the word has the meaning 2, above. —4. The investing of money at a risk of loss on the chance of unusual gain; specifically, buying and selling, not in the ordinary course of commerce for the continuous marketing of commodities, but to hold in the expectation of selling at a profit upon a change in values or market rates. Thus, if a merchant lays in for his regular trade a much larger stock than he otherwise would because he anticipates a rise in prices, this is not termed speculation; but if he buys what he does not usually deal in, not for the purpose of extending his business, but for the chance of a sale of the particular articles at a profit by reason of anticipated rise, it is so termed. In the language of the exchanges, speculation includes all dealing in futures and options, whether purchases or sales.

The establishment of any new manufacture, of any new branch of commerce, or of any new practice in agriculture, is always a speculation from which the projector promises himself extraordinary profits.
Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, I. x. 1.

A vast speculation had fail'd,
And ever he mutter'd and madden'd.
Tennyson, Maud, i. 3.

5. A game at cards, the leading principle of which is the purchase of an unknown card on the calculation of its probable value, or of a known card on the chance of no better appearing during the game, a part of the pack not being dealt. Latham. = Syn. 2. Hypothesis, etc. See theory.

speculatist (spek′ū-lā-tist), n. [< speculate + -ist.] A speculative philosopher; a person who, absorbed with theoretical questions, pays little attention to practical conditions.

Such speculatists, by expecting too much from friendship, dissolve the connection. Goldsmith, Friendship.

Fresh confidence the speculatist takes For every hare-brain'd proselyte he makes.
Cowper, Progress of Error.

speculative (spek′ū-lā-tiv), a. [= F. spéculatif = Sp. Pg. especulativo = It. speculativo, < LL. speculativus, pertaining to or of the nature of observation, < L. speculari, view: see speculate.] 1†. Pertaining to or affording vision or outlook: a meaning influenced by Latin specula, 'a watch-tower.'

Now roves the eye;
And, posted on this speculative height,
Exults in its command. Cowper, Task, i. 289.

2†. Looking; observing; inspecting; prying.

My speculative and officed instrument.
Shak., Othello, i. 3. 271.

To be speculative into another man, to the end to know how to work him or wind him or govern him, proceedeth from a heart that is double and cloven.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i.

3. Given to speculation; contemplative; theoretical.

He [Washington] was not a speculative, but a practical man; not at all devoted to Ideas.
Theodore Parker, Historic Americans, Washington, p. 114.

Speculative men are deemed unsound and frivolous.
Emerson, Misc., p. 12.

4. Purely scientific; having knowledge as its end; theoretical: opposed to practical; also (limiting a noun denoting a person and signifying his opinions or character), in theory, and not, or not merely, in practice; also, cognitive; intellectual. In this sense (which has no connection with speculation), speculative translates Aristotle's θεωρητικός. Thus, speculative science is science pursued for its own sake, without immediate reference to the needs of life, and does not exclude experimental science.

I do not think there are so many speculative atheists as men are wont to imagine.
Boyle, Christian Virtuoso, part i.

It is evidently the intention of our Maker that man should be an active and not merely a speculative being.
Reid, Active Powers, Int.

When astronomy took the form of a speculative science, words were invented to denote distinctly the conceptions thus introduced.
Whewell, Philos. of Inductive Sciences, I. liii.

A distinction merely speculative has no concern with the most momentous of all practical controversies.
J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 51.

5. Inferential; known by reasoning, and not by direct experience: opposed to intuitive; also, improperly, purely a priori. This meaning was introduced into Latin by Anselm, with reference to I Cor. xiii. 12, where the Vulgate has speculum. Speculative cognition is cognition not intuitive.

6. Pertaining or given to speculation in trade; engaged in speculation, or precarious ventures for the chance of large profits; of the nature of financial speculation: as, a speculative trader; speculative investments or business.

The speculative merchant exercises no one regular, established, or well-known branch of business.
Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, I. x. 1.

Speculative geometry, philosophy, reason, theology, etc. See the nouns.

speculatively (spek′ū-lā-tiv-li), adv. In a speculative manner; as or by means of speculation, in either the intellectual or the material sense.

speculativeness (spek′ū-lā-tiv-nes), n. The state of being speculative, or of consisting in speculation.

speculativism (spek′ū-lā-tiv-izm), n. [< speculative + -ism.] The tendency to speculation or theory, as opposed to experiment or practice; a theorizing tendency. Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 269. [Recent.] speculator (spek′ū-lā-tor), n. [= F. spéculateur = Sp. Pg. especulador = It. speculatore, < L. speculator, an explorer or scout, a searcher, an investigator, < speculari, pp. speculatus, spy out, watch, observe, view: see speculate.] 1†. An observer or onlooker; a watcher; a lookout; a seer; in a specific use, an occult seer; one who looks into mysteries or secrets by magical means.

All the boats had one speculator, to give notice when the fish approached. Broome.

2. One who engages in mental speculation; a person who speculates about a subject or subjects; a theorizer.

The number of experiments in moral science which the speculator has an opportunity of witnessing has been increased beyond all calculation. Macaulay, History.

3. One who practises speculation in trade or business of any kind. See speculation, 4.

speculatorial† (spek″ū-lā-tō′ri-al), a. [< L. speculatorius, pertaining to a scout or observer (see speculatory), + -al.] Speculatory.

speculatory (spek′ū-lā-tō-ri), a. [< L. speculatorius, pertaining to a scout or observer, < speculator, an observer: see speculator.] 1†. Practising or intended for oversight or outlook; overseeing; overlooking; viewing.

My privileges are an ubiquitary, circumambulatory, speculatory interrogatory, redargutory immunity over all the privy lodgings. Carew, Cœlum Britannicum.

Both these [Roman encampments] were nothing more than speculatory outposts to the Akeman-street.
T. Warton, Hist. Kiddington, p. 66.

2. Given to, or of the nature or character of, speculation; speculative. [Rare.]

speculatrix (spek′ū-lā-triks), n.; pl. speculatrices (spek″ū-lā-trī′sēz). [L., fem. of speculator: see speculator.] A female speculator. [Rare.]

A communion with invisible spirits entered into the general creed [in the sixteenth century] throughout Europe, and crystal or beryl was the magical medium. . . . Persons even of ordinary rank in life pretended to be what they termed speculators, and sometimes women were speculatrices. I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., II. 297.

speculum (spek′ū-lum), n.; pl. specula (-lą), sometimes speculums (-lumz). [< L. speculum, a mirror, a copy or imitation (cf. specula, a watch-tower, lookout), < specere, look at, behold: see species.] 1. Something to look into or from; specifically, a mirror or looking-glass. —2. An attachment to or part of an optical instrument, as a reflecting telescope, having a brightly polished surface for the reflection of objects. Specula are generally made of an alloy called speculum-metal, consisting of ten parts of copper to one of tin, sometimes with a little arsenic to increase its whiteness. Another speculum alloy is made of equal weights of steel and platinum. Specula are also made of glass covered with a film of silver on the side turned toward the object.

3. In ornith.: (a) An ocellus or eye-spot, as of a peacock's tail. See ocellus, 4. (b) The mirror of a wing, a specially colored area on some of the flight-feathers. It is usually iridescent-green, purple, violet, etc., and formed by a space of such color on the outer webs of several secondaries, toward their end, and commonly set in a frame of different colors formed by the tips of the same secondaries or of the greater wing-coverts, or of both. Sometimes it is dead-white, as in the gadwall. A speculum occurs in various birds, and as a rule in ducks, especially the Anatinæ, being in these so constant and characteristic a marking that some breeds of game-fowls are named duckwing in consequence of a certain resemblance in the wing-markings. See silver-duckwing. Also called mirror. See cuts under Chaulelasmus and mallard.

The wing [in Anatinæ] has usually a brilliant Speculum, which, like the other wing-markings, is the same in both sexes. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 690.

4. In anat., the septum lucidum of the brain. See cut under corpus.—5. In med. and surg., an

It was in fact the speculum or watch-tower of Teufelsdröckh; wherefrom, sitting at ease, he might see the whole life-circulation of that considerable City. Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, i. 3.

Duck-billed speculum, a name sometimes applied to Sims's vaginal speculum, and more rarely to some of the bivalve vaginal specula, whose valves resemble a duck's bill. Also called duck-bill.—Ear-speculum, an instrument, usually a hollow cone, introduced into the meatus externus for holding the hairs out of the way so that the bottom of the passage may be illuminated and seen.—Nose-speculum. See rhinoscope.

speculum-metal (spek'ū-lum-met″al), n. See speculum, 2.

sped (sped). A preterit and past participle of speed.

spedet, spedeful†. Old spellings of speed, speedful.

speece†, n. An old form of spece, spice.

speech (spēch), n. [Early mod. E. also speach; < ME. speche, spæche, earlier spek, spekе, < AS. spǣc, spēc, earlier sprǣc, sprēc (= OS. sprāca = OFries. spreke, spretse, sprake = D. spraak = MLG. sprake = OHG. sprāhha, MHG. See set.—Speech from the throne, in British politics, a speech or address prepared by the ministry in the name of the sovereign, and read at the opening of Parliament either by the sovereign in person or by commission. It states briefly the relations with foreign countries and the condition of domestic affairs, and outlines vaguely the chief measures which will be considered by Parliament. Also called King's (or Queen's) speech.—Syn. Speech, Address, Harangue, Oration. Speech is generic, and applies to any form of words uttered; it is the thing spoken, without reference to its quality or the manner of speaking it. An address is a speech viewed as spoken to one or more persons, and is generally of the better sort: as, Paul's speech on Mars' Hill; his address before Felix. A harangue is a noisy speech, usually unstudied and unpolished, addressed to a large audience and in a violent manner. An oration is a formal, impressive, studied, and elaborately polished address: as, Webster was selected to deliver the oration when the corner-stone of the Bunker Hill monument was laid, and again when the monument was completed. See sermon and language.

Spellynge, sillabicacio. Prompt. Parv., p. 468.

Our common spelling is often an untrustworthy guide to etymology. J. Hadley, Essays, p. 356.

To prepare the way for such a change [a reform in spelling] the first step is to break down, by the combined influence of enlightened scholars and of practical educators, the immense and stubborn prejudice which regards the established modes of spelling almost as constituting the language, as having a sacred character, as in themselves preferable to others. All agitation and all definite proposals of reform are to be welcomed so far as they work in this direction. Proc. Amer. Philol. Assoc., VII. 35.

It may be observed that it is mainly among the class of half-taught dabblers in philology that etymological spelling has found its supporters. All true philologists and philological bodies have uniformly denounced it as a monstrous absurdity, both from a practical and a scientific point of view. H. Sweet, Handbook of Phonetics, p. 201.

2. A collocation of letters representing a word; a written word as spelled in a particular way.

Our present spelling is in many particulars a far from trustworthy guide in etymology, and often, indeed, entirely falsifies history. Such spellings as island, author, delight, sovereign, require only to be mentioned, and there are hundreds of others involving equally gross blunders, many of which have actually corrupted the spoken language. H. Sweet, Handbook of Phonetics, p. 200.

Phonetic spelling. See phonetic. — Spelling reform, the improvement by regulation and simplification of the conventional orthography of a language, specifically of the English language; the proposed simplification of English orthography. The spelling of all languages having a recorded history tends to lag behind the changes of pronunciation, and in time a reform becomes necessary. In English, since the gradual fixation of the spelling after the invention of printing, the separation of spelling and pronunciation has become very wide, and numerous proposals for spelling reform have been made. The present organized effort for spelling reform has arisen out of the spread of phonography, which is based on phonetic spelling, and from the more recent spread of the study of comparative philology, which is also based on phonetics. Proposals for a gradual reform in spelling have been put forth jointly by the American Philological Association and the Philological Society of England, and are advocated by the Spelling Reform Association. Amended spellings have been accepted to some extent by various periodicals, and are admitted, less freely, into recent books. Movements for spelling reform exist also in France, Germany, Denmark, and other countries. A spelling reform has been accomplished in Dutch, Spanish, and other tongues, and to some extent, by government action, in Germany.

spelling-bee (spel'ing-bē), n. Same as spelling-match.

spelling-book (spel'ing-bůk), n. A book from which children are taught to spell.

spelling-match (spel'ing-mach), n. A contest for superiority in spelling between two or more persons or parties. A formal spelling-match is usually between sides or sets of persons chosen by two leaders. Any person who misspells one of the words given out retires, and the victory belongs to the side that has the larger number left at the close. Also called spelling-bee. [U. S.]

spellken† (spel'ken), n. [Also speelken; < D. spel, play (see spell[3]), + E. ken[5], a resort.] A playhouse; a theater. [Low slang.]

Spencerian (spen-sē'ri-an), a. [< Spencer (see def.) + -ian.] Pertaining or relating to the English philosopher Herbert Spencer (born 1820), or characteristic of his philosophical system. See Spencerianism.

Spencerianism (spen-sē'ri-an-izm), n. The philosophy of Herbert Spencer, called by him the synthetic philosophy. Like almost all the ancient and a considerable part of the modern philosophical systems, it is a philosophy of evolution; but it differs from most of these in reducing evolution to the rank of a mere secondary principle, and in making the immutable law of mechanics the sole fundamental one. Spencer has formally stated his philosophy in sixteen propositions, which concern the relations of evolution and dissolution. These are of a special and detailed character, so that he does not countenance the claim made for him of the principle of evolution itself. His sixteenth proposition states that under the sensible appearances which the universe presents to us, and "transcending human knowledge, is an unknown and unknowable power."

spencer-mast (spen'sėr-mast), n. See mast[1].

spency (spen'si), n.; pl. spencies (-siz). The stormy petrel, Procellaria pelagica. C. Swainson. [Shetland Isles.]

It consists of a strophe of eight decasyllabic lines and an Alexandrine, with three rimes, the first and third line forming one, the second, fourth, fifth, and seventh another, and the sixth, eighth, and ninth the third. It is the stateliest of English measures, and is used by Thomson in his "Castle of Indolence," by Byron in his "Childe Harold," etc.

II. n. The poetical measure of Spenser's "Faerie Queene"; a Spenserian verse or stanza. O. W. Holmes, Poetry.

spent (spent), p. a. [Pp. of spend[1], v.] 1. Nearly or quite exhausted or worn out; having lost force or vitality; inefficient; impotent: generally in a comparative sense. A spent deer or other animal is one that has been chased or wounded nearly to death. A spent ball is a flying ball (from a gun) that has so nearly lost its impulse as to be unable to penetrate an object struck by it, though it may occasionally inflict a dangerous contused wound. A spent bill of lading or other commercial document is one that has fulfilled its purpose and should be canceled.

The forme of his style there, compared with Tullies writyng, is but euen the talke of a spent old man.
Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 152.

Mine eyes, like spent lamps glowing out, grow heavy.
Fletcher, Sea Voyage, iii. 1.

2. Exhausted by spending or spawning; of fish, having spawned.

speos (spē'os), n. [< Gr. σπέος, a cave.] In Egypt. archæol., a temple or part of a temple, or a tomb of some architectural importance, as distinguished from a mere tunnel or syringe, excavated in the solid rock; a grotto-temple or tomb, as at Beni-Hassan (see cut under hypogeum) and Abou Simbel (Ipsamboul). The larger speos of Abou Simbel is about 169 feet deep, and has all the parts of a complete open-air Egyptian temple.

Speotyto (spē-ot'i-tō), n. [NL. (Gloger, 1842), < Gr. σπέος, a cave, + τυτώ, the night-owl.] An American genus of Strigidæ, containing several species of small long-legged earless owls which live in treeless regions and burrow in the ground, as S. cunicularia of the pampas of South America and S. hypogæa of the prairies of western North America; the burrowing owls. A variety of the latter also inhabits Florida, and the genus is likewise represented in the West Indies. S. hypogæa is the species which is found in association with prairie-dogs and spermophiles, giving rise to many exaggerated accounts of the relation between the bird and the mammal. These owls were formerly placed in the genus Athene, and were also called Pholeoptynx. See cuts under owl.

sperr†, v. t. A variant of spar[1].

sperable[1]† (spē'ra-bl), a. [< L. sperabilis, that may be hoped for, < sperare, hope, < spes, hope.] Capable of being hoped for; affording grounds of hope.

Wherin, surely perceaving his own cause not sperable, he doth honorably and wisely.
Sir W. Cecil (June 3, 1565), in Ellis's Hist. Letters, 2d ser., [clxxii.

sperage†, n. Same as sparage.

sperate† (spē'rāt), a. [< L. speratus, pp. of sperare, hope.] Hoped for; not hopeless: opposed to desperate. In old law, in determining whether debts to a testator, the right to collect which devolved upon the executor, were assets to be accounted for by him, though not collected, regard had to be had to their character, whether they were sperate or desperate.

sperclet, v. A Middle English form of sparkle.

spere†. An old spelling of spear[1], speer[1], sphere.

Spergula (spėr'gū-lä), n. [NL. (Dillenius, 1719), named from its scattering its seeds; < L. spargere, scatter: see sparge.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Caryophyllaceæ and tribe Alsineæ. It is characterized by the presence of small scarious stipules, by flowers with five styles alternate with the five sepals, and by a one-celled capsule with its five valves opposite the sepals. There are 2 or 3 species, widely scattered through temperate regions of either hemisphere, and especially abundant in fields and cultivated places of the Old World. They are annual herbs with dichotomous or clustered branches, the swollen and succulent axils bearing apparent whorls of awl-shaped leaves. The small white or pink flowers form raceme-like cymes with conspicuous pedicels. The species are known by the general name of spurry, sometimes sandweed.

Spergularia (spėr-gū-lā'ri-ä), n. [NL. (Persoon, 1805), < Spergula + -aria.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Caryophyllaceæ and tribe Alsineæ. It is distinguished from the allied genus Spergula by its three styles and three-valved capsule, and differs from Arenaria, to which it was formerly referred, in the possession of stipules. There are 3 or 4 species, scattered through temperate regions, especially along salt-marshes and shores. They are commonly diffuse herbs, small and often succulent, with thread-like or linear leaves, often, as in Spergula, with secondary clusters of leaves forming apparent whorls at the axils. The small flowers open in bright sunshine, and are white or rose-colored or commonly purplish. The species are known as sand-spurry. At least 3 species are found on the Atlantic coast of the United States. See Tissa.

sperhawk, n. Same as sparhawk for sparrow-hawk.

sperket (spėr'ket), n. [Also spirket; origin obscure.] A large hooked wooden peg, not much curved, to hang saddles, harness, etc., on. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

> High on the spirket there it hung.
> Bloomfield, The Horkey. (Davies.)

sperling (spėr'ling), n. Same as sparling[1].

sperm[1] (spėrm), n. [< ME. sperme, < OF. sperme, sparme, F. sperme = Sp. Pg. esperma = It. sperma, < L. sperma, < Gr. σπέρμα (σπερματ-), seed, < σπείρειν, sow. Cf. spore[2].] The male seed of any kind, as the semen or seminal fluid of the higher vertebrates, the male spawn or milt of the lower vertebrates, or the seminal elements of any animal, containing the male germs, or spermatozoa.

sperm[2] (spėrm), n. [Abbr. of spermaceti.] 1. Same as spermaceti.—2. A sperm-whale.—3. Sperm-oil.

sperma (spėr'mą), n. Same as semen (which see).

spermaceti (spėr-mą-set'i or -sē'tī), n. and a. [Formerly or dial. also, in corrupt forms, parmaceti, parmacety, parmaectty, parmacity, parmacitty, etc.; < F. spermaceti = Sp. esperma-ceti = Pg. espermacete = It. spermaceti, < NL. spermaceti, lit. 'whale's seed,' the substance having been regarded as the spawn of the whale; < L. sperma, seed, + ceti, gen. of cetus, < Gr. κῆτος, whale: see Cete[3].] I. n. A peculiar fatty substance contained in the characteristic adipose tissue of the cavity of the head of the sperm-whale or cachalot, Physeter or Catodon macrocephalus, and related cetaceans. During the life of the animal the spermaceti is in a fluid state, and when the head is opened has the appearance of an oily white liquid. On exposure to the air the spermaceti concretes and precipitates from the oil, from which it may then be separated. After being purified by an elaborate process the spermaceti concretes into a white, crystallized, brittle, semi-transparent unctuous substance, nearly inodorous and insipid. It dissolves in boiling alcohol, and as the solution cools it is deposited in perfectly pure lamellated crystals. In this state it is called cetin. Spermaceti is a mixture of various fatty acids and derivatives of the acids. It is bland and demulcent, but in medicine it is chiefly employed externally as an ingredient in ointments, cerates, and cosmetics. It has also been largely used in the manufacture of candles.

> By this [fallacy of Æquivocation] are they deluded who conceive spermaceti [sperma Cœti, Pseud. Ep., 1646], which is found about the head, to be the spawn of the whale.
> Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 1.

II. a. 1. Pertaining to, derived from, or composed of spermaceti or sperm.—2. Producing or yielding spermaceti, as the sperm-whales.—Spermaceti ointment. See ointment.

spermaceti-oil (spėr-mą-set'i-oil), n. Sperm-oil.

spermaceti-whale (spėr-mą-set'i-hwāl), n. A sperm-whale.

Spermacoce (spėr-mą-kō'sē), n. [NL. (Dillenius, 1732), so called in allusion to the carpels pointed with one or more calyx-teeth; < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, germ, + ἀκωκή, a point, < ἀκή, a point, anything sharp.] A genus of rubiaceous plants, type of the tribe Spermacoceæ. It is characterized by flowers with from two to four calyx-lobes sometimes with smaller teeth between, a small two-cleft or capitate stigma, and a dry fruit of two carpels which separate when ripe and are each or only one of them open, one often retaining the membranous axis. There are about 175 species, scattered through tropical and subtropical regions, and particularly common in America. They are annual or perennial herbs or low undershrubs, with smooth, rough, or hairy stems, commonly with four-angled branchlets. They bear opposite leaves, which are either sessile or petioled, membranous or coriaceous, nerved or feather-veined. The stipules are united with the petioles into a bristle-bearing membrane or sheath. The small sessile flowers are solitary in the axils or variously clustered, often in dense axillary and terminal heads, and are white, pink, or blue. In allusion to the heads, the species are called button-weed. Five species occur in the United States all southern and summer-flowering and with a short white corolla; S. glabra, the most common, extends into Ohio. Several species are in repute for medicinal properties, especially as substitutes for ipecacuanha, for which S. ferruginea and S. Poaya are used in Brazil, and S. verticillata in the West Indies. The root of S. hispida is used as a sudorific in India.

Spermacoceæ (spėr-mą-kō'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Chamisso and Schlechtendal, 1828), < Spermacoce + -eæ (shortened for Spermacoceeæ).] A tribe of rubiaceous plants, of which Spermacoce is the type, embracing 18 other genera, chiefly natives of tropical or subtropical America.

spermaduct (spėr'mą-dukt), n. [< NL. spermaductus, irreg. < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + L. ductus, a duct: see duct.] A spermatic duct, or sperm-duct; a male gonaduct or seminal passage; a hollow tubular or vesicular organ in the male, serving to convey or detain sperm or semen. It is connected in some way with the spermary, from which it carries off the sperm, and in many animals is specifically called the vas deferens. But it is a more comprehensive term, including the whole of the male generative passages, of whatever kind. Also spermaductus, spermiduct.

spermagone (spėr'mą-gōn), n. Same as spermogone.

spermagonium (spėr-mą-gō'ni-um), n. Same as spermogonium.

spermalist (spėr'mą-list), n. [< sperm[1] + -al + -ist.] A spermist.

spermangium (spėr-man'ji-um), n.; pl. spermangia (-ą). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, sperm, + ἀγγεῖον, vessel.] In Algæ, a receptacle containing the spores: same as conceptacle, 2 (b).

spermaphyte (spėr'mą-fīt), n. See spermophyte.

spermarium (spėr-mā'ri-um), n.; pl. spermaria (-ą). [NL., < L. sperma, seed, + -arium.] A spermary: used in distinction from ovarium.

spermary (spėr'mą-ri), n.; pl. spermaries (-riz). [< NL. spermarium.] The male germ-gland or essential sexual organ, of whatever character; the sperm-gland, or spermatic organ, or seminal gonad, in which spermatozoa are generated, in its specialized condition in the higher animals known as the testis or testicle. The term is used in distinction from ovary, both spermaries and ovaries being gonads. Also spermarium.

spermatemphraxis (spėr″mą-tem-frak'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + ἐμφράσσειν, obstruct: see emphractic.] Obstruction to the discharge of semen.

spermatheca (spėr-mą-thē'ką), n.; pl. spermathecæ (-sē). [NL., irreg. < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + θήκη, a case. Cf. spermotheca.] A spermatic case, capsule, or sheath; a receptacle for semen; specifically, the seminal receptacle in the female, as of various insects and other invertebrates, which receives and conveys or detains the sperm of the male. More correctly spermatotheca. See cuts under Dendrocœla, ovariole, and Rhabdocœla.

spermathecal (spėr-mą-thē'kąl), a. [< spermatheca + -al.] Of or pertaining to a spermatheca: as, a spermathecal duct or vesicle.

> On reaching the point where the spermathecal duct debouches, they [ova] are impregnated by the spermatozoa which escape now from the spermatheca and meet the ova. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 658.

spermatia, n. Plural of spermatium.

spermatic (spėr-mat'ik), a. [< OF. (and F.) spermatique = Sp. espermático = Pg. espermatico = It. spermatico, < L. spermaticus, < Gr. σπερματικός, < σπέρμα, seed: see sperm[1].] 1. Of or pertaining to sperm, or male seed, in general; containing spermatozoa, or consisting of sperm or semen; seminal: as, spermatic fluid.—2. Secreting spermatozoa; generating or producing semen; seminal, as a spermary.—3. Connected with or related to the spermary, or essential male organ; subservient to the male function; testicular: as, spermatic vessels; the spermatic cord.—4. In bot., resembling or of the nature of spermatia: as, spermatic filaments; spermatic gelatin.—5. Figuratively, seminal; germinal; fructifying. [Rare.]

> I find certain books vital and spermatic, not leaving the reader what he was; he shuts the book a richer man.
> Emerson, Books.

External spermatic fascia. Same as intercolumnar fascia (which see, under fascia).—External spermatic nerve, the genital branch of the genitocrural nerve. It supplies the cremaster muscle.—Internal spermatic fascia. Same as infundibuliform fascia (which see, under fascia).—Spermatic artery, any artery supplying a testis or other spermary, corresponding to an ovarian artery of the female. In man the spermatic arteries are two long slender arteries arising from the abdominal aorta a little below the renal arteries, and passing along each spermatic cord, to be distributed to the testes.—Spermatic calculus, a concretion sometimes found in the seminal vesicles.—Spermatic canal. (a) The inguinal canal. (b) Any spermatic duct, as the vas deferens.—Spermatic cartridge. Same as spermatophore.—Spermatic cord. See cord[1].—Spermatic cyst, in pathol., a cyst arising in the testicle near the epididymis, and filled with fluid in which are often found spermatozoa, crystals, etc. See spermatocele.—Spermatic duct. Same as spermaduct.—Spermatic filament, a spermatozoön.—Spermatic gelatin, in bot., a gelatinous substance in spermogonia which when wet aids in the expulsion of the spermatia.—Spermatic logos. See logos.—Spermatic plexus of nerves. See plexus.—Spermatic plexus of veins, a thick plexus of convoluted vessels formed in the spermatic cord by the venæ comites of the spermatic arteries. These veins coalesce after leaving the inguinal canal, and empty into the vena cava inferior of the right side and the renal vein of the left side. This venous plexus corresponds to the ovarian venous plexus of the female, and is specifically known as the pampiniform plexus. When varicose, it constitutes a varicocele or cirsocele, an extremely common affection, most frequent on the left side.—Spermatic rete. Same as rete vasculosum testis (which see, under rete).—Spermatic sac, a sac containing a number of spermatozoa packed or bundled together, to be discharged on rupture of the sac.

spermatical (spėr-mat'i-kąl), a. [< spermatic + -al.] Same as spermatic. Bacon.

spermatigenous (spėr-mā-shi-oj'e-nus), a. [< NL. spermatium + Gr. -γενής, producing: see -genous.] In bot., producing or bearing spermatia: as, a spermatiogenous surface.

> On the contrary, they are disk-shaped or cushion-shaped bodies with the spermatiogenous surface folded into deep sinuous depressions. De Bary, Fungi (trans.), p. 241.

spermatiophore (spėr-mā'shi-ō-fōr), n. [< NL. spermatium + Gr. -φόρος, < φέρειν = E. bear[1].] In bot., a structure bearing a spermatium.

spermatism (spėr'mą-tizm), n. [< spermat(ize) + -ism.] 1. Emission of semen; a seminal discharge.—2. Same as spermism.

spermatist (spėr'mą-tist), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + -ist.] Same as spermist.

spermatium (spėr-mā'shi-um), n.; pl. spermatia (-ą). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed.] In bot., an exceedingly minute cylindrical or rod-shaped body in fungi, produced like spores in cup-like organs called spermogonia. The spermatia are conjectured to be the male fertilizing organs, although the male sexual function of all spermatia in fungi has not been demonstrated. In more technical language a spermatium is a "male non-motile gamete conjugating with the trichogyne of a procarp" (Goebel).

spermatize (spėr'mą-tīz), v. i.; pret. and pp. spermatized, ppr. spermatizing. [< Gr. σπερματίζειν, sow, yield seed, < σπέρμα, seed: see sperm[1].] To yield male sperm or seed; have a seminal emission; discharge semen.

spermatoaa, n. Plural of spermatoön. Owen.

spermatoal (spėr-mą-tō'ąl), a. [< spermato(ön) + -al.] Pertaining to a spermatoön. Owen.

spermatoblast (spėr'mą-tō-blast), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + βλαστός, bud, sprout, shoot.] The bud or germ of a spermatozoön; a germinal blastema whence spermatozoa are produced. Spermatoblasts form a layer of nucleated and nucleolated cells in the seminal tubules, which proliferates or projects into the lumen of the tubule with often a lobed or digitate end; and from every lobe a spermatozoön develops and is discharged, leaving a branching stump of the spermatoblast. Also spermoblast, nematoblast.

spermatoblastic (spėr'mą-tō-blas″tik), a. [< spermatoblast + -ic.] Of or pertaining to spermatoblasts or the formation of spermatozoa; germinal or budding, as a structure which develops spermatozoa. Also spermoblastic.

spermatocele (spėr'mą-tō-sēl), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + κήλη, a tumor.] A retention-cyst of the epididymis or testicle containing spermatozoa.

spermatocyst (spėr'mą-tō-sist), n. [< NL. spermatocystis, < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + κίστις, bladder: see cyst.] 1. In anat., a seminal vesicle.—2. In pathol., a spermatic cyst or sac. See spermatic.

spermatocystic (spėr″mą-tō-sis'tik), a. [< spermatocyst + -ic.] Containing spermatozoa, as a cyst; of the nature of a spermatocyst.

spermatocystidium (spėr″mą-tō-sis-tid'i-um), n.; pl. spermatocystidia (-ą). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + κίστις, bladder, + dim. -ίδιον.] In bot., same as antheridium. Hedwig.

spermatocystis (spėr″mą-tō-sis'tis), n. [NL.: see spermatocyst.] Same as spermatocyst.

spermatocystitis (spėr″mą-tō-sis-tī'tis), n. [NL., < spermatocystis + -itis.] Inflammation of the seminal vesicles.

spermatocytal (spėr″mą-tō-sī'tąl), a. [< spermatocyte + -al.] Of or pertaining to spermatocytes; of the nature of a spermatocyte.

spermatocyte (spėr'mą-tō-sīt), n. [< NL. spermatium + Gr. κίτος, a hollow: see cyte.] 1. In bot., the mother-cell of a spermatozooid.

> The protoplasm in each of the two cells of the antheridium [in Salvinia] contracts and by repeated bipartition divides into four roundish primordial cells (spermatocytes), each of which produces a spermatozoid.
> Goebel, Special Morphology of Plants (trans.), p. 230.

2. The cell whose nuclear chromatin and cell-protoplasm become respectively the head and tail of the spermatozoön: synonymous with spermatoblast. Flemming.

> These spermatocytes may either all develop into spermatozoa (Mammals), or a single spermatocyte may become modified as a basilar cell (Plagiostome Fishes), or a number may form an envelope or cyst around the others (Amphibians and Fishes). Encyc. Brit., XX. 412.

spermatogemma (spėr″mą-tō-jem'ą), n.; pl. spermatogemmæ (-ē). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + gemma, a bud.] A mass of spermatoeytes; a multinuclear spermatic cyst; a kind of spermatoblast. See also spermosphere. Encyc. Brit., XX. 412.

spermatogenesis (spėr″mą-tō-jen′e-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + γένεσις, origin.] In biol., the formation or development of spermatozoa. Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 301.

spermatogenetic (spėr″mą-tō-jē-net′ik), a. [< spermatogenesis, after genetic.] Of or pertaining to spermatogenesis; exhibiting or characterized by spermatogenesis: as, a spermatogenetic process or result; a spermatogenetic theory. Encye. Brit., XX. 412.

spermatogenous (spėr-mą-toj′e-nus), a. [< Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + -γενής, producing: see -genous.] Producing spermatozoa.

spermatogeny (spėr-mą-toj′e-ni), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + -γένεια, < -γενής, producing: see -geny.] The generation or production of spermatozoa; spermatogenesis.

spermatogonium (spėr″mą-tō-gō′ni-um), n.; pl. spermatogonia (-ą). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + γονή, generation.] 1†. In bot., same as pycnidium, 1.—2. A primitive or formative seminal cell, forming a kind of sperm-morula, or spermosphere composed of spermatoblasts or spermatocytes, which in turn give rise to spermatozooids. La Valette St. George.

spermatoid (spėr′mą-toid), a. [< Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + εἶδος, form.] Resembling sperm, or male seed; sperm-like; of the nature of sperm; spermatic or seminal.

spermatological (spėr″mą-tō-loj′i-kal), a. [< spermatology + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to spermatology. Also spermological.

spermatologist (spėr-mą-tol′ō-jist), n. [< spermatology + -ist.] One who is versed in spermatology. Also spermologist.

spermatology (spėr-mą-tol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The doctrine or body of facts and opinions regarding sperm, semen, or the male elements of procreation, as those of spermatogenesis or spermatogeny. Also spermology.

spermatomere (spėr′mą-tō-mēr), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + μέρος, part.] One of the parts into which the male or female pronucleus of an ovum may divide after fertilization.

Two of these "residual globules" are, according to them, expelled by the spermatocaeres during their nuclear metamorphosis preceding division.

Micros. Science, XXVI. 597.

spermatoön† (spėr-mą-tō′on), n.; pl. spermatoa (-ą). [< Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + ᾠόν, an egg.] The nucleus of a sperm-cell or spermatozoön; a cell which stands in the relation of such a nucleus, as that out of or from which a spermatozoön may be developed; a spermatoblast.

Spermatophilus (spėr-mą-tof′i-lus), n. [NL. (Wagler, 1830), emended from Spermophilus.] Same as Spermophilus.

spermatophoral (spėr-mą-tof′ō-ral), a. [< spermatophore + -al.] Of the character of or pertaining to a spermatophore. Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 291.

spermatophore (spėr′mą-tō-fōr), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + φέρειν = E. bear[1].] A special case, capsule, or sheath containing spermatozoa; specifically, one of the peculiar spermatic cysts of cephalopods (also called spermatic or seminal cartridge, seminal rope, or filament of Needham), usually forming a long cylindrical structure in which several envelops may be distinguished. The contents of such a spermatophore are not exclusively seminal, for in the hinder part of each there is a special substance, the exploding mass, which serves to discharge the packet of spermatozoa. These are invested in a special tubular tunic, and packed in the front part of the spermatophore, like a charge of shot in a cartridge in front of the powder. Behind this packet of sperm the exploding mass forms a spiral coil, which extends through the greater part of the spermatophore and is continuous behind with the coat of the latter. When the spermatophore is wetted it swells up and bursts, through the force of the spring coiled inside, and the spermatozoa are discharged with considerable force. A spermatophore thus offers a striking analogy to the nematophore or thread-cell of a cœlenterate, though the object attained is not urtication or nettling, but a seminal emission and consequent impregnation of the female. A spermatophore of some sort, less complex than that of cephalopods, is very commonly found in several classes of invertebrates.

spermatophorous (spėr-mą-tof′ō-rus), a. [As spermatophore + -ous.] Bearing or conveying seed, sperm, or spermatozoa; spermatogenous; seminiferous; specifically, bearing sperm as a spermatophore; of or pertaining to a spermatophore; spermatophoral.

spermatorrhea, spermatorrhœa (spėr″mą-tō-rē′ą), n. [NL. spermatorrhœa; < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + ῥεῖν, flow, run.] Involuntary seminal loss.

spermatospore (spėr′mą-tō-spōr), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + σπόρος, a sowing.] A kind of cell which gives rise to spermatozoa. Also spermospore.

spermatotheca (spėr″mą-tō-thē′ką), n. Same as spermatheca.

spermatovum (spėr-mą-tō′vum), n.; pl. spermatova (-vą) [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + L. ovum, egg.] A fecundated egg; an ovum after impregnation by spermatozoa, whence its substance consists of material from both parents. Also spermovum.

Spermatozoa (spėr″mą-tō-zō′ą), n. pl. [NL., pl. of spermatozoön, q. v.] 1†. A supposed class or other group of animalcules; sperm-animals: so called before their nature was known, when they were regarded as independent parasitic organisms.—2. [l. c.] Plural of spermatozoön.

spermatozoal (spėr″mą-tō-zō′al), a. [< spermatozoön + -al.] Same as spermatozoan.

spermatozoan (spėr″mą-tō-zō′an), a. and n. [< spermatozoön + -an.] I. a. Of the nature of a spermatozoön; of or pertaining to spermatozoa.

II. n. A spermatozoön or spermatozooid.

spermatozoic (spėr″mą-tō-zō′ik), a. [< spermatozoön + -ic.] Same as spermatozoan.

spermatozoid (spėr″mą-tō-zō′id), a. and n. [< spermatozoön + -id[2].] See spermatozooid.

spermatozoidal (spėr″mą-tō-zō′i-dal), a. [< spermatozoön + -oid + -al.] Same as spermatozooid. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 443.

spermatozooid (spėr″mą-tō-zō′oid), a. and n. [< spermatozoön + -oid.] I. a. Resembling a spermatozoön; of spermatozoan nature or appearance.

Spermatozooids of Adiantum Capillus-Veneris.

II. n. 1. A spermatozoön. Von Siebold. Also, less commonly, spermatozoid. See zooid.—2. In bot., a male ciliated motile gamete produced in an antheridium: same as antherozoid. In this sense more commonly spermatozoid. See also cut under antheridium.

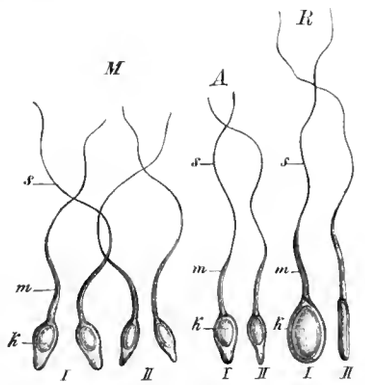
spermatozoön (spėr″mą-tō-zō′on), n.; pl. spermatozoa (-ą). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + ζῷον, an animal.] 1. One of the numberless microscopic bodies contained in semen, to which the seminal fluid owes its vitality, and which are the immediate and active means of impregnating or fertilizing the ovum of the female; a spermatic cell or filament; a spermatozoan or spermatozooid. Spermatozoa are the vital and essential product of a spermary, male gonad, or testis, as ova are of the ovary or female gonad; their production, or the ability to produce them, is the characteristic distinction of the male from the female organism, whatever their size or shape or other physical character, and however various may be the organ in which they are produced. Spermatozoa, like ova, have the morphological value of the cell; and a spermatozoön is usually a cell in which a cell-wall, cell-contents, and cell-nucleus, with or without a nucleolus, may be distinguished. The form may be spherical, like the ovum, and indistinguishable therefrom by any physical character; more frequently, and especially in the higher animals, these little bodies are shaped like a tadpole, with a small spherical or discoidal head, a succeeding rod-like or bacillar part, and a long slender tail or caudal filament, capable of spontaneous vibratile movements, by means of which the spermatozoa swim actively in the seminal fluid, like a shoal of microscopic fishes, every one seeking, in the passages of the female into which the fluid has been injected, to discover the ovum in which to bury itself, in order to undergo dissolution in the substance of the ovum. They are smaller than the corresponding ovum, and several or many of them may be embedded in one ovum. The actual union of spermatozoa with an ovum, and fusion of their respective protoplasms, is required for impregnation, and is the consummation of sexual intercourse, to which all other acts and processes are simply ancillary or subservient. Spermatozoa may be killed by cold, or chemical or mechanical injury, like any other cells. These bodies, very similar to various animalcules, were discovered and named spermatozoa by Leeuwenhoek in 1677; they were at first and long afterward regarded as independent organisms, variously classed as parasitic helminths or infusorians—such a view being held, for instance, by Von Baer so late as 1827 or 1835. Von Siebold, who found them in various vertebrates, called them spermatozooids. Their true nature appears to have been first recognized by Kölliker. Spermatozoa or their equivalents are diagnostic of the male sex under whatever conditions they exist, whether in male individuals separate from the female, or in those many hermaphrodite animals which unite the two sexes in one individual; and the organ which produces them is invariably a testis or its equivalent spermary, of whatever character. The male elements of the lowest animals, however, as Protozoa, do not ordinarily receive the name spermatozoa, this being specially applied to the more elaborate male cells of the character above described. The origination of spermatozoa has of late years been the subject of much research and discussion; the details of the process, as observed in different animals, or under different conditions of investigation, together with conflicting doctrinal conclusions, have occasioned a large special vocabulary. See many words preceding and following this one.



Spermatozoa.

M, four spermatozoa of man; A, two of ape; R, two of rabbit. In each case, I, broadest view, II, profile, of k, kernel or nucleus of the head, and m, filamentous body, ending in s, the long slender tail.

2†. [cap.] A genus of animalcules. Von Baer, 1827.

sperm-ball (spėrm′bâl), n. A spherical cluster of spermatozoa, such as occurs in some sponges. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 424.

sperm-blastoderm (spėrm′blas″tō-dėrm), n. A blastodermic layer of formative spermatozoa composing the surface of a sperm-blastula.

sperm-blastula (spėrm′blas″tū-lą), n. A spermatic blastula, or hollow sphere whose surface is a layer of formative spermatozoa.

sperm-cell (spėrm′sel), n. 1. A spermatozoön: so called from its morphological valence as a cell.—2. A cell giving rise to spermatozoa; a spermatoblast or spermatocyte.

spermet†, n. An obsolete spelling of sperm[1].

Spermestes (spėr-mes′tēz), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1837), said to be (irreg.) < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + ἐσθίειν, eat.] The typical genus of Spermestinæ, containing six or eight species confined to Africa and Madagascar. Such are S. cucullata, S. poensis, and S. bicolor, of the continent, and the Madagascar S. nana. These little birds are closely related to Amadina, of which Spermactes is often rated as a subgenus.

Spermestinæ (spėr-mes-tī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Spermestes + -inæ.] An extensive subfamily of Ploceidæ, named from the genus Spermestes. The very numerous species, about 150, are chiefly African and Asiatic, but some of them extend to Australia and various Polynesian islands. Among them are the amadavats and estrilds. Leading genera are Lagonosticta, Spermospiza, Pyrenestes, Estrelda, and Amadina. See cut under senegal.

spermestine (spėr-mes′tin), a. Of, or having characters of, the Spermestinæ.

spermic (spėr′mik), a. [< sperm[1] + -ic.] Same as spermatic.

spermidium† (spėr-mid′i-um), n.; pl. spermidia (-ą). [NL., < L. sperma, seed, germ, + -idium.] In bot., same as achenium, 1.

spermiduct (spėr′mi-dukt), n. [< L. sperma, sperm, + ductus, a duct: see duct. Cf. spermaduct.] A passage for the conveyance of sperm in the female of Echinorhynchus. See the quotation. [Rare.]

From the lower end of the ovarium [of the female of Echinorhynchus] two short oviducts, or rather spermiducts, arise, and almost immediately unite into a sort of uterus, which is continued into the vagina.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 555.

spermin (spėr′min), n. [< sperm[1] + -in[2].] A non-poisonous alkaloid (C_2H_5N) obtained from sputum, human semen, organs of leucemic patients, and alcoholic anatomical preparations.

spermism (spėr′mizm), n. [< sperm[1] + -ism.] The theory or doctrine that the male sperm contains the whole germ of the future animal, which develops entirely from a spermatozoön, the ovum serving merely as a mold or matrix; animalculism. Also spermatism.

spermist (spėr′mist), n. [< sperm[1] + -ist.] One who holds the theory of spermism or spermatism; an animalculist; the opposite of ovulist. See theory of inclosement, under inclosement. Also spermatist.

sperm-kernel (spėrm′kėr″nel), n. Same as spermoecoccus.

sperm-morula (spėrm'mor″ō-lä), n. A spermatic morula; a mulberry-mass of formative spermatozoa.

sperm-nucleus (spėrm'nū″klē-us), n. 1. The nucleus of a spermatozoön; a spermococcus or sperm-kernel.—2. In bot., the nucleus of a male gamete, which coalesces with the nucleus of an oösphere to form a germ-nucleus. Goebel.

spermoblast (spėr'mō-blast), n. Same as spermatoblast.

spermoblastic (spėr-mō-blas'tik), a. Same as spermatoblastic.

spermocarp (spėr'mō-kärp), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., the so-called "fruit" in the Characeæ and certain confervoid algæ. It is the fertilized and matured female organ with its variously formed covering or pericarp and accessory cells. The "fruit" of the Characeæ has also been called the antheridium, sporangium, enveloped oögonium, and sporophydium, by different authors. Sporophydium seems the preferable term. See these various words. Compare sporocarp. See cuts under antheridium and conceptacle.

spermococcus (spėr-mō-kok'us), n.; pl. spermococci (-sī). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + κόκκος, grain, berry.] The nucleus of a spermatozoön: it consists of the head of the sperm-animalcule, excepting its thin outer layer. Also sperm-kernel.

spermoderm (spėr'mō-dėrm), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + δέρμα, skin.] In bot., the integument of a seed in the aggregate; properly, same as testa.

spermogastrula (spėr-mō-gas'trō-lä), n.; pl. spermogastrulæ (-lē). [NL., < L. sperma (see sperm[1]) + NL. gastrula, q. v.] A sperm-blastula which has undergone a kind of gastrulation.

spermogone (spėr'mō-gōn), n. [< NL. spermogonium.] In bot., same as spermogonium; also employed by some writers to denote the spermatium or spore-like body which is produced in a spermogonium. See spermogonium, spermatium. Also spelled spermagone.

spermogonia, n. Plural of spermogonium.

spermogoniferous (spėr″mō-gō-nif'e-rus), a. [< NL. spermogonium, q. v., + L. ferre = E. bear[1].] In bot., bearing or producing spermogonia.

spermogonium (spėr-mō-gō'ni-um), n.; pl. spermogonia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. σπερμογόνος, producing seed, < σπέρμα, seed, + -γονος, producing: see -gony.] In bot., a cup-shaped cavity or

Section of Barberry-leaf (of its natural thickness at x), infested with Puccinia graminis in its æcidial stage.

sp, spermogonia; a, fruit, inclosed within the peridium p, or open and discharging spores. (Somewhat magnified.)

receptacle in which spermatia are produced. See spermatium, peridium, Puccinia (with cut). Also spermagonium.

spermogonous (spėr-mog'ō-nus), a. [< spermogone + -ous.] In bot., resembling or having the character of spermogonia or spermogones.

sperm-oil (spėrm'oil), n. Spermaceti-oil; the oil of the spermaceti-whale. See train-oil.

spermolith (spėr'mō-lith), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + λίθος, stone.] A concretion which occasionally forms in the seminal ducts.

spermological (spėr-mō-loj'i-kal), a. Same as spermatological.

spermologist (spėr-mol'ō-jist), n. [< spermolog-y + -ist.] 1. Same as spermatologist.—2. In bot., one who treats of or collects seeds; a student of or an authority in spermology.

spermology (spėr-mol'ō-ji), n. 1. Same as spermatology.—2. In bot., that branch of science which investigates the seeds of plants.

spermonucleus (spėr-mō-nū'klē-us), n.; pl. spermonuclei (-ī). [NL., < L. sperma (see sperm[1]) + nucleus, q. v.] A male pronucleus. See masculonucleus, feminonucleus. Hyatt.

Spermophila (spėr-mof'i-lä), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1827), < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + φιλεῖν, love.] 1. In ornith., the little seed-eaters or pygmy finches, an extensive genus of small American fringilline birds, with very short stout bills like a bullfinch's, giving name to the subfamily Spermophilinæ. The limits of the genus vary with different authors, but it usually includes about 50 species, of tropical and subtropical America. The only one of these which occurs in the United States is S. moreleti, which is found in Texas, and known as Morelet's pygmy finch. It is only about 4 inches long, with extremely turgid bill convex in all its outlines, short rounded wings, and still shorter tail. The male is entirely black and white, the latter color tinged with buff on the under parts; the female is ollvaceous-brown above and brownish-yellow or buff below, with whitish wing-bars. A like dissimilarity of coloration characterizes the sexes throughout the genus. By those who hold that Spermophila is the same name as Spermophilus, this genus is called Sporophila; and some or all of the species are often placed in a more extensive genus Gyrinorhynchus, of which Spermophila or Sporophila then constitutes one section. See cut under grassquit. Also called Spermospiza.

2. In mammal., same as Spermophilus, 1. J. Richardson, 1825.—3†. In entom., a genus of arachnidans. Hentz, 1842.

spermophile (spėr'mō-fil), n. [< NL. Spermophilus.] 1. A rodent quadruped of the genus Spermophilus, as a ground-squirrel or suslik, of which there are numerous species in Europe, Asia, and North America. See cuts under suslik and Spermophilus.—2. A fringilline bird of the genus Spermophila; a little seed-eater, of which there are numerous Central and South American species. See cut under grassquit.

Spermophilinæ (spėr″mō-fi-lī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Spermophilus (in sense 2 < Spermophila) + -inæ.] 1. In mammal., the ground-squirrels or spermophiles, prairie-dogs, and marmots, one of two subfamilies into which the Sciuridæ are sometimes divided, represented by the genera Spermophilus, Tamias, and Arctomys. It is not separated from Sciurinæ or the true arboreal squirrels by any trenchant characters, and the two divisions intergrade through the genera Xerus and Tamias. But the spermophilines are of terrestrial habits, with usually stouter form, larger size, and less bushy tail than the Sciurinæ. They inhabit Europe, Asia, and especially North America, where the greater number of species are found, and most of them are called gophers. The group is also called Arctomyinæ. See cuts under Arctomys, chipmunk, prairie-dog, Spermophilus, and suslik.

2. In ornith., an American subfamily of Fringillidæ, named from the genus Spermophila. P. L. Sclater, 1862.

spermophiline (spėr-mof'i-lin), a. and n. [< Spermophilinæ.] I. a. Pertaining to the Spermophilinæ, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the Spermophilinæ.

Spermophilus (spėr-mof'i-lus), n. [NL. (F. Cuvier, 1822), < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + φιλεῖν, love.] 1. A genus of ground-squirrels, giving name to the Spermophilinæ. The type is S. citillus of Europe, the suslik, but the genus is especially well represented in North America, where more than a dozen distinct species occur, some of which run into several varieties. They are divided into 3 subgenera. (1) Otospermophilus, in which the ears are high and pointed, the tail is full and broad, with the hairs from two thirds to three quarters of the length of the head and body, and the whole aspect is strongly squirrel-like. To this section belongs S. grammurus, with its varieties beecheyi and douglassi; these are the common ground-squirrels of California, Oregon, and Washington, and east to the Rocky Mountains. S. annulatus of Mexico probably also belongs here. (2) Colobotis, in which the ears are short and marginiform, the tail is short, from one third to one half the length of the body, and the form is stout. The Old World species belong here, and several of those of North America, as Parry's spermophile, S. empetra (or parryi), which inhabits British America and Alaska, and runs into several varieties, as kodiacensis and erythroglutæus. In the United States the best-known species of this section is Richardson's spermophile, S. richardsoni, very generally distributed, in one or another of its varieties, from the plains of the Saskatchewan to those of the Laramie. It is a tawny animal, resembling a prairie-dog in appearance and habits. Here also belong S. mollis, S. spilosoma, and S. obsoletus, inhabiting western parts of the United States. (3) Ictidomys, which includes several slender-bodied species, almost like weasels in this respect (whence the name), with the ears generally small or rudimentary, as in Colobotis, the skull long and narrow, the tail variable, and the first upper premolar generally small. The most squirrel-like of these is Franklin's spermophile, S. franklini, inhabiting Illinois and Missouri and northward to 64°. It not distantly resembles a gray squirrel, the tail being bushy, two thirds as long as the head and body. The commonest species is S. tridecemlineatus, the thirteen-lined spermophile, or federation squirrel, so called by Dr. S. L. Mitchill (in 1821) from the original thirteen States of the United States, it having a number (six or eight) of longitudinal stripes, with five or seven rows of spots between them, likened by that patriot to the "stars and stripes." It inhabits the prairies of the United States at large, and extends northward into British America. Other species of this section are S. mexicanus of Texas and Mexico, and S. tereticaudus of Arizona and California. Three of the above animals, S. grammurus, S. franklini, and S. tridecemlineatus, are numerous enough in cultivated districts to be troublesome, and all of them are called gophers, a name shared by the different animals of the family Geomyidæ. They are all terrestrial (S. franklini somewhat arboreal), and live in burrows underground, much like prairie-dogs, though none of them dig so extensively. In many parts of the Dakotas and Montana the ground is honeycombed with the burrows of S. richardsoni. They feed on herbage and seeds, and are also to some extent carnivorous. They are prolific, like most rodents, and bring forth their young in burrows. Those of northern regions hibernate like marmots. Their flesh is eatable. The name of the genus is also written Spermophila and Spermatophilus, but both of these forms are rare. See also cut under suslik.

Thirteen-lined Spermophile, or Federation Squirrel (Spermophilus tridecemlineatus).

2. In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects. Gebler.

spermophore (spėr'mō-fōr), n. [< NL. spermophorum.] Same as spermophorum.

spermophorum (spėr-mof'ō-rum), n.; pl. spermophora (-rä). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + φέρειν = E. bear[1].] 1. A seminal vesicle.—2. In bot., a synonym of placenta and also of funiculus.

Spermophyta (spėr-mof'i-tä), n. pl. [NL., pl. of spermophytum: see spermophyte.] The highest of the four principal groups or divisions into which the vegetable kingdom is separated by the later systematists. It embraces the higher or flowering plants, those producing true seeds. It is the same as Phanerogamia. The correlative terms in descending systematic order are Pteridophyta, Bryophyta, and Thallophyta. See Phanerogamia, and compare Cryptogamia.

spermophyte (spėr'mō-fīt), n. [< NL. spermophytum, < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + φυτόν, plant.] In bot., a member of the Spermophyta; a plant producing true seeds; a phænogam, or flowering plant. Sometimes written spermaphyte.

spermophytic (spėr-mō-fit'ik), a. [< spermophyte + -ic.] In bot., capable of producing true seeds; phænogamic.

spermoplasm (spėr'mō-plazm), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + πλάσμα, anything formed or molded: see plasm.] The protoplasm of a spermatozoön; the plasmic contents of a spermule, distinguished from the spermococcus or sperm-kernel. Also spermoplasma.

spermopodium (spėr-mō-pō'di-um), n.; pl. spermopodia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + ποίς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] In bot., an unused name for the gynophore in Umbelliferæ.

spermosphere (spėr'mō-sfēr), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + σφαῖρα, sphere.] A mass of spermatoblasts; a spermatogemma.

Spermospiza (spėr-mō-spī'zä), n. [NL. (G. R. Gray, 1840), < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + σπίζα, a finch.] 1. A leading genus of Spermestinæ, the type of which is the African S. hæmatina. Originally called Spermophaga, a name too near Spermophagus.—2. A genus of American finches, synonymous with Spermophila. Bonaparte.

spermospore (spėr'mō-spōr), n. Same as spermatospore.

spermotheca (spėr-mō-thē'kä), n.; pl. spermothecæ (-sē). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + θήκη, a case. Cf. spermatheca.] In bot., a pericarp. [Rare.]

spermous (spėr'mus), a. [< sperm[1] + -ous.] Same as spermatic.

spermovarian (spėr-mō-vā'ri-an), a. [< spermovari(um) + -an.] Of or pertaining to a spermovarium.

spermovarium (spėr-mō-vā'ri-um), n.; pl. spermovaria (-ä). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + NL. ovarium, q. v.] A hermaphroditic genital gland; a bisexual gonad; an ovispermary or ovotestis, which gives rise, simultaneously or successively, to male and female products. See cut under ovotestis.

spermovary (spėr-mō'va-ri), n.; pl. spermovaries (-riz). [< NL. spermovarium.] Same as spermovarium.

spermovum (spėr-mō'vum), n.; pl. spermova (-vä). [< Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + L. ovum, egg.] Same as spermatovum.

sperm-rope (spėrm'rōp), n. A string of spermatozoa packed in a long case; a package of sperm, as one of the spermatic cartridges of a cephalopod. For description, see spermatophore. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 682.

spermule (spėr'mūl), n. [< NL. spermulum, dim. of LL. sperma, seed: see sperm[1].] A seed-animalcule, sperm-cell, spermatozoön, or zoöspermium; the fertilizing male element, of the morphological valence of a cell. Spermule is Haeckel's term, corresponding to ovule for the female egg-cell. The protoplasm of the spermule is called spermoplasm, and the nucleus spermococcus.

spermulum (spėr'mū-lum), n.; pl. spermula (-lä). [NL.: see spermule.] A spermule, sperm-cell, or spermatozoön.

sperm-whale (spėrm'hwāl), n. [< sperm[2] + whale[1].] The spermaceti-whale or cachalot, Physeter (or Catodon) macrocephalus, belonging to the family Physeteridæ (which see for technical characters; see also cut of skull under Physeter). It is one of the largest of animals, exceeded in length only by the great rorqual or finner, Balænoptera sibbaldi; it has teeth in the lower jaw, but none and no baleen in the upper; and the enormous square head contains the valuable product spermaceti. This whale is also the source of the best whale-oil, and its chase is a very important industry in the warmer waters of all seas. See cachalot.—Porpoise sperm-whale, a pygmy sperm-whale, or snub-nosed cachalot, of the family Physeteridæ and genus Kogia, as K. brevirostris (K. floweri of Gill), of the Pacific and chiefly tropical seas, but sometimes occurring off the coast of the United States.—Sperm-whale porpoise, a bottle-nosed whale of the genus Hyperoödon. It belongs to the same family (Physeteridæ) as the sperm-whale, but to a different subfamily. (See Ziphiinæ.) The species are several, not well determined, and with confused synonymy. They are larger than any porpoises properly so called, though far inferior in size to the true sperm-whale.

Sperm-whale (Physeter macrocephalus).

speron†, n. [< It. sperone = OF. esperon, F. éperon, a spur, the beak of a ship: see spur.] The beak of a ship.

Which barks are made after the maner of Fusts or Galliots, with a Speron and a couered poope.
Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 215.

sperr†, v. t. Same as spar[1].

sperrable†, n. An obsolete form of sparable.

sperrylite (sper'i-līt), n. [Named after F. L. Sperry, the discoverer.] A native arsenide of platinum, occurring in minute isometric crystals with pyrite and chalcopyrite at the Vermilion mine, near Sudbury in Ontario. It has a tin-white color, brilliant metallic luster, and a specific gravity of 10.6. It is the only compound of platinum known to occur in nature.

serse†, (spėrs), v. t. and i. [An aphetic form of disperse, or var. of sparse.] To disperse. Spenser, Visions of Bellay, l. 195.

sperthe†, n. A Middle English form of sparth.

spertle†, v. and n. An obsolete form of spurtle.

sperver†, spervyour†, n. Same as sparver.

spessartite, spessartine (spes'är-tīt, -tin), n. [< Spessart, a mountainous region in Germany, north of the river Main.] A manganesian variety of garnet.

spet, v. and n. An obsolete or dialectal variant of spit[2].

spetch (speech), n. [Assibilated form of speck[1].] A piece of skin or hide used in making glue: as, size made from buffalo-spetches.

spetous†, a. See spitous.

spew (spū), v. [Formerly also spue: < ME. spewen, spuen, spiwen, < AS. spīwan (pret. spāw, pp. spiwen) = OS. spīwan = OFries. spīa = MD. spijen, spouwen, spuuwen, D. spuwen = OHG. spīwan, spīan, MHG. spien, G. speien = Icel. spýja = Sw. Dan. spy = Goth. speiwan, spew, = L. spuere = Gr. πτύειν, Doric ψύττειν (for σπύειν*), spit, = OBulg. plĭvati, pljuti = Bohem. plíti = Pol. pluc = Russ. plevatĭ = Lith. spiauti = Lett. splaut (Slav. √ pljŭ < spljŭ < spŭ), spit. Hence ult. spit[2].] I. intrans. 1. To discharge the contents of the stomach; vomit; puke.

Then he gan to spewe, and up he threwe
The balsame all againe.
Robin Hood and the Peddlers (Child's Ballads, V. 248).

2. In gun., to run at the mouth: said of a gun which bends at the chase, or whose muzzle droops, from too quick firing.

II. trans. 1. To vomit; puke up or out; eject from or as if from the stomach.

So then because thou art lukewarm . . . I will spue thee out of my mouth. Rev. iii. 16.

2. To eject as if by retching or heaving; send or cast forth from within; drive by internal force or effort: often used figuratively.

That the land spue not you out also, when ye defile it, as it spued out the nations that were before you.
Lev. xviii. 28.

To live, for me, Jane, is to stand on a crater-crust which may crack and spew fire any day.
Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xx.

To spew oakum, said of the seams of a ship when the oakum starts out from between the planks.

spewer (spū'ėr), n. [< spew + -er[1].] One who or that which spews.

spewiness†, (spū'i-nes), n. The state of being spewy, moist, or damp.

The coldness and spewiness of the soil.
Bp. Gauden, Hieraspistes (1653), p. 551. (Latham.) spewing†, (spū'ing), a. Same as spewy.

The soil [in New England] for the general is a warm kind of Earth, there being little cold spewing Land.
S. Clarke, Four Plantations in America (1670), p. 29.

[See also the quotation under emuscation.]

spewy†, (spū'i), a. [< spew + -y[1].] Wet; boggy; moist; damp.

The lower valleys in wet winters are so spewy that they know not how to feed them. Mortimer, Husbandry.

Speyside pine. See pine[1].

sp. gr. An abbreviation of specific gravity.

sphacel (sfas'el), n. [< NL. sphacelus, q. v.] Same as sphacelus.

sphacela (sfas'e-lä), n.; pl. sphacelæ (-lē). [< Gr. σφάκελος, gangrene.] In bot., in certain algæ, a hollow chamber of considerable size which is developed from the apical cell of each branch. When young it is filled with dark mucilaginous contents, which at a later stage become watery. The term is sometimes used as nearly or quite the equivalent of propagulum. Also sphacele.

Sphacelaria (sfas-e-lā'ri-ä), n. [NL., so called in allusion to the tips of the branches, which are black and shriveled when dried; < Gr. σφάκελος, gangrene.] A genus of algæ, typical of the family Sphacelariaceæ. They have olive-brown, branching, filamentous fronds, with cortieating cells wanting or confined to the base of the frond. The axis and branches are terminated by a large apical cell, from which, by transverae, longitudinal, and obliqne divisions, a solid frond is formed whose external surface is composed of rectangular cells arranged in regular transverse bands. The unilocular and plurilocular sporangia are spherical or ellipsoidal, borne on short pedicels; reproduction is non-sexual, by means of propagnla. The species are variable, and difficult of determination. There are two species along the New England coast.

Sphacelariaceæ (sfas-e-lā-ri-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphacelaria + -aceæ.] A family of algæ, typified by the genus Sphacelaria. They are olive-brown seaweeds with branching polysiphonous fronds, the branches of which terminate in a peculiar large apical cell. Also Sphacelarieæ.

sphacelate (sfas'e-lāt), a. [< sphacelus + -ate[1].] 1. In pathol., dead; necrosed.—2. In bot., decayed, withered, or dead.

sphacelate (sfas'e-lāt), v.: pret. and pp. sphacelated, ppr. sphacelating. [< sphacelus + -ate[2].]

I. intrans. To become necrosed.

II. trans. To affect with sphacelus or necrosis.

The floor of the existing wound was of course formed by sphacelated hepatic tissue. Lancet, 1890, II. 425.

sphacelated (sfas'e-lā-ted), a. [< sphacelate + -ed[2].] Same as sphacelate.

sphacelation (sfas-e-lā'shon), n. [< sphacelate + -ion.] Necrosis; the process of becoming or making gangrenous; mortification.

sphacele (sfas'ēl), n. [< NL. sphacela.] In bot., same as sphacela.

Sphacelia (sfā-sē'li-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. σφάκελος, gangrene.] A former genus of fungi, now known to be the conidial stage or form of Claviceps, the ergot. It constitutes the first stage of the ergot, and consists of a growth of mycelium destroying and replacing the ovary of the host, taking approximately the form of the latter. It produces conidial spores upon the tips of basidia which radiate from the surface of the hyphal mass. See ergot[1], 2. Also Sphacelium.

sphacelism (sfas'e-lizm), n. [< sphacel(us) + -ism.] Same as sphacelismus.

sphacelismus (sfas-e-lis'mus), n. [NL., < Gr. σφακελισμός, gangrene, < σφακελίζειν, be gangrened or blighted, < σφάκελος, gangrene: see sphacelus.] Necrosis.

Sphacelium (sfā-sē'li-um), n. [NL.: see Sphacelia.] Same as Sphacelia.

Sphaceloma (sfas-e-lō'mä), n. [NL., < Gr. σφάκελος, gangrene: see sphacelus.] A genus of pyrenomycetous fungi, containing the very destructive species (S. Ampelinum) known as anthracnose. It first appears on the shoots, leaves, and berries of grape-vines as minute brown spots which are a little depressed in the middle and have a slightly raised darker-colored rim. These spots soon increase in size and elongate longitudinally. On the fruit the spots retain a more or less regularly rounded outline, and have a well-defined band of bright vermilion between the dark border and the central portion. Finally, under the action of the disease, the berries dry up, leaving nothing, apparently, but the skin and seeds. Washing the vines with a strong solution of sulphate of iron before the appearance of the leaves has been found effective in destroying or checking the disease. See anthracnose.

sphacelus (sfas'e-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. σφάκελος, gangrene, mortification, caries, also a spasm, convulsion.] 1. Necrosis.—2. A necrosed mass of tissue.

Sphæralcea (sfē-ral'sē-ä), n. [NL. (St. Hilaire, 1824), so called from the fruit, a round head of carpels; < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + ἀλκέα, a plant, Malva Alcea, related to the plant here defined.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Malvaceæ, tribe Malveæ, and subtribe Abutileæ. It is characterized by flowers each with three bractlets, and fruit of numerous two-valved carpels naked within, each containing two or three reniform seeds. There are about 25 species, natives of warmer parts of America, with 4 at the Cape of Good Hope. They are herbs or shrubs, in habit resembling the genus Malva. They usually bear angled or lobed leaves, and short-pedicelled violet or reddish flowers single or clustered in the axils or forming a raceme or spike. They are known as globe mallow, and several species are in cultivation for ornament under glass. They possess marked demulcent properties, especially S. cisplatina, a decoction of which is used as a remedy in Brazil, and as a substitute for marshmallows.

Sphæranthus (sfē-ran'thus), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1753), so called from the clustered heads of flowers; < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + ἄνθος, flower.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Compositæ, tribe Inuloideæ, and subtribe Plucheineæ. It is characterized by flowers without pappus, the central ones bisexual, fertile or sterile, tubular and four- to five-cleft, the outer female and fertile, filiform and minutely two- to three-toothed, and by the aggregation of the small flower-heads into a dense solitary terminal spherical or ovoid glomernle. There are about 10 species, natives of the tropics of Asia, Africa, and Australia. They are erect villous or glutinous herbs, with divaricate branches terminated by the pink flower-clusters. The leaves are alternate, toothed, and decurrent on the stem. S. hirtus is known as the East Indian globe-thistle; S. mollis is a common Indian weed of dry cultivated land, clothed everywhere with soft glandular hairs which give off a powerful honey-like odor.

sphæraphides (sfē-raf'i-dēz), n. pl. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + ῥαφίς, a needle.] In bot., the more or less spherical masses of crystals or raphides occurring in the cells of many plants. Also called sphere-crystals.

sphæret, n. An obsolete form of sphere.

sphærenchyma (sfē-reng'ki-mä), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + ἔγχυμα, an infusion: see parenchyma.] Spherical or spheroidal cellular tissue, such as is found in the pulp of fruits: a modification of parenchyma. Treas. of Bot.

Sphæria (sfē'ri-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball: see sphere.] A genus of pyrenomycetous fungi, giving name to the family Sphæriaceæ. The perithecia are black, carbonaceous or membranaceous, pierced at the apex, usually superficial or erumpent. The species are very numerous, among them being S. morbosa, the destructive black-knot of plum- and cherry-trees. See black-knot, 2.

Sphæriaceæ (sfē-ri-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Fries, 1825), < Sphæria + -aceæ.] A family of pyrenomycetous fungi, typified by the genus Sphæria.

Sphæriacei (sfē-ri-ā'sē-ī), n. pl. [NL., < Sphæria + -aceī.] Same as Sphæriaceæ.

sphæriaceous (sfē-ri-ā'shius), a. [< Sphæria + -aceous.] In bot., resembling or belonging to the genus Sphæria or the Sphæriaceæ.

sphæridia, n. Plural of sphæridium, 1.

sphæridial (sfē-rid'i-al), a. [< sphæridium + -al.] Of or pertaining to the sphæridia of a sea-urchin.

Sphæridiidæ (sfē-ri-di'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphæridium + -idæ.] The Sphæridiinæ as a family of palpicorn coleopterous insects. Also Sphæridiadæ, Sphæridida, Sphæridides, Sphæridiites, Sphæridiota, Spheridiites.

Sphæridiinæ (sfē-rid-i-ī'nē), n. pl. [NL. (Le Conte, 1883, as Sphæridinii), < Sphæridium + -inæ.] A subfamily of the water-beetle family Hydrophilidæ, remarkable from the fact that its forms are all terrestrial. They are small, oval, convex, or hemispherical beetles which live in the excrement of herbivorous mammals. They are usually black in color, with the elytra frequently spotted or margined with yellow. They are divided into six genera, of which five are represented in the United States. See Sphæridium, 2.

sphæridium (sfē-rid'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. σφαιρίδιον, dim. of σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere: see sphere.] 1. Pl. sphæridia (-ä). In echinoderms, one of the numerous minute spheroidal bodies, rarely more than one hundredth of an inch long, which are found in nearly all sea-urchins upon the ambulacral plates, especially those nearest the mouth. Each contains a dense glassy calcareous skeleton, and is articulated by a short pedicel, like a spine, to one of the tubercles. The sphæridia are supposed to be olfactory or auditory sense-organs.

In some genera, these sphæridia, to which Lovén ascribes a sensory function (probably auditory), are sunk in fosse of the plate to which they are attached.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 490.

2. [cap.] [NL. (Fabricius, 1795).] The typical genus of the Sphæridiinæ, comprising mainly African species distinguished by the elongate scutellum and the visible pygidium. S. scarabæoides is an example.

Sphæriidæ (sfē-rī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphærium + -idæ.] A family of fresh-water bivalve mollusks, typified by the genus Sphærium, formerly called Cycladidæ, and now generally united with the typical Cyrenidæ under the latter name.

sphæristerium (sfē-ris-tē'ri-um), n.; pl. sphæristeria (-ä). [< L. sphæristerium, < Gr. σφαιριστήριον, a place for playing ball, < σφαιρίζειν, play at ball, < σφαῖρα, a ball: see sphere.] In class. antiq., any place or structure for the exercise of ball-playing; a tennis-court.

sphærite (sfē'rīt), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + *-ite*².] A hydrous phosphate of aluminium, allied to wavellite in structure and composition.

Sphærium (sfē'ri-um), n. [NL. (Scopoli, 1777), < Gr. σφαίριον, dim. of σφαῖρα, a ball.] The typical genus of the Sphæriidæ, or a genus of the family Cyrenidæ, for a long time generally known as Cyclas. It contains many small clam-like fresh-water shells.

Sphærobacteria (sfē″rō-bak-tē'ri-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σφαῖρα, a sphere, + NL. bacterium, q. v.] In Cohn's system of classification, a tribe of schizomycetes or bacteria, with spherical cells, as in the genus Micrococcus. See Micrococcus.

Sphærococcaceæ (sfō″rō-ko-kā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphærococcus + -aceæ.] The same or nearly the same as the Sphærococcoideæ.

Sphærococcoideæ (sfē″rō-ko-koi'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphærococcus + -oideæ.] An order or suborder of florideous algæ, named from the genus Sphærococcus. The fronds are cylindrical or membranaceous, often of very delicate substance. The antheridia form superficial patches, or are occasionally contained in sunken cavities.

Sphærococcus (sfē-rō-kok'us), n. [NL. (Stackhouse), < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + κόκκος, a berry.] A genus of florideous algæ, giving name to the order Sphærococcoideæ. There are no American species.

Sphærodactylus (sfē-rō-dak'ti-lus), n. [NL. (Wagler, 1830), < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + δάκτυλος, finger.] A genus of American gecko lizards, having toes ending in small circular sucking-disks, by means of which they adhere to perpendicular surfaces. There are large carinate scales on the back, and small smooth hexagonal ones on the belly. S. notatus is one of the smallest of lizards, about 2 inches long, found in Florida and Cuba; it is notable as the only gecko of the United States. Also Sphæriodactylus.

Sphærogaster (sfē-rō-gas'tėr), n. [NL. (Zetterstedt, 1842), < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + γαστήρ, belly.] A genus of dipterous insects, of the family Acroceridæ, containing one species, S. arcticus, a minute shining-black fly, which occurs from the northernmost point of Lapland to northern Sweden.

Sphærogastra (sfē-rō-gas'trä). n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + γαστήρ, belly.] A division of arachnidans, containing those whose abdomen is more or less spheroidal or globose, as the spiders: contrasted with Arthrogastra. See cut under spider.

sphæroid, n. See spheroid.

Sphæroma (sfē-rō'mä), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1802), < Gr. σφαίρωμα, anything made round or globular, < σφαιροῦν, make round or globular, < σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere: see sphere.] The typical genus of Sphæromidæ, so called from their habit of rolling themselves up in a ball when disturbed, like some of the Oniscidæ. They are known as globe-slaters. Also Spheroma. Leach.

sphæromere, n. See spheromere.

sphæromian, a. and n. See spheromian.

Sphæromidæ (sfē-rom'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphæroma + -idæ.] A family of isopod crustaceans, typified by the genus Sphæroma; the globe-slaters. Also Sphæromatidæ.

sphærosiderite, n. See spherosiderite.

sphærospore, n. Same as spherospore.

sphærostilbite (sfē-rō-stil'bīt), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + E. stilbite.] A variety of stilbite.

Sphærotheca (sfē-rō-thē'kä), n. [NL. (Léveillé, 1851), < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + θήκη, a case.] A genus of pyrenomycetous fungi, belonging to the family Erysipheæ, characterized by a perithecium which contains only a single ascus. The appendages are simple threads not unlike the mycelium with which they are frequently interwoven. The ascus is usually suborbicular in shape, and generally contains eight spores. S. humuli, called the hop-mildew, is destructive to the hop-vine; S. pannosa is injurious to rose-bushes; and S. mors-uvæ is the common gooseberry-mildew. See hop-mildew.

sphærotherian (sfē-rō-thē'ri-an), a. and n. [< Sphærotherium + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the genus Sphærotherium.

II. n. A milleped of the genus Sphærotherium or family Sphærotheriidæ.

Sphærotheriidæ (sfē″rō-thē-rī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphærotherium + -idæ.] A family of chilognath myriapods, typified by the genus Sphærotherium, having aggregated eyes and lateral antennæ. Also called Zephroniidæ.

Sphærotherium (sfē-rō-thē'ri-um), n. [NL., (Brandt, 1841), < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + θηρίον, a wild beast.] A genus of chilognath myriapods, of the family Glomeridæ, and giving name to the Sphærotheriidæ. S. elongatum is an example. Also called Zephronia.

sphærozoa, n. Plural of sphærozoön.

sphærozoid (sfē-rō-zō'id), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Sphærozoidæ.

II. n. A sphærozoön, or member of the Sphærozoidæ.

Sphærozoidæ (sfē-rō-zō'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphærozoum + -idæ.] A family of spumellarians, or compound radiolarians, typified by the genus Sphærozoum, with a skeleton composed of numerous detached spicules scattered round the social central capsules, or embedded in their common gelatinous body.

sphærozoön (sfē-rō-zō'on), n.; pl. sphærozoa (-ä). [NL.: see Sphærozoum.] An individual or species of the genus Sphærozoum or family Sphærozoidæ.

Sphærozoum (sfē-rō-zō'um), n. [NL., < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball. + ζῷον, an animal.] A genus of compound radiolarians, typical of the family Sphærozoidæ, the protoplasm of which contains colored cellæform bodies, and gives rise to a network of spicules forming a loose detached skeleton. S. orodimare is an example. A second species is S. punctatum. See also cut under spicule.

Sphærozoum orodimare, magnified.

sphærule, sphærulite, etc. See spherule, etc.

Sphagnaceæ (sfag-nā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bridel, 1826), < Sphagnum + -aceæ.] A monotypic order of mosses; the peat-mosses. They are soft and flaccid caulescent plants, generally of large size, growing in more or less compact tufts or patches on the surface of bogs, or floating in stagnant water, more rarely on the borders of mountain rivulets. They are whitish, yellowish, or sometimes red or olive-colored, and are perennial by the annual prolongation of the stems or by simple innovations at the apex. The branches are generally spreading, in lateral fascicles of from two to seven, rarely more, those at the summit of the stem capitate. The leaves are nerveless, translucent, formed of a single layer of two kinds of cells. The inflorescence is monœcious or dicœcious; the male organs (antheridia) are borne upon clavate catkin-like branches, solitary at the side of each leaf, globose or ovoid, pedicellate; the female organs (archegonia) are generally three or four terminating a short branch, only one perfecting fruit and forming a capsule. The capsule is globose, operculate with a convex or nearly flat lid, the orifice naked; the spores are of two kinds. See cut under Sphagnum.

Sphagnei (sfag'nē-ī), n. pl. [NL., < L. sphagnos, < Gr. σφάγνος, a kind of moss.] Same as Sphagnaceæ.

sphagnicolous (sfag-nik'ō-lus), a. [< NL. Sphagnum + L. colere, inhabit.] In bot. and zoöl., growing or living upon or among mosses of the genus Sphagnum.

sphagnologist (sfag-nol'ō-jist), n. [< sphagnology + -ist.] In bot., a student of the Sphagnaceæ; one who is an authority on, or interested in the study of, the Sphagnaceæ. Jour. Roy. Micros. Soc., 2d ser., VI. 108.

sphagnology (sfag-nol'ō-ji), n. [< NL. Sphagnum + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The special study of the Sphagnaceæ.

sphagnous (sfag'nus), a. [< NL. Sphagn(um) + -ous.] In bot., pertaining to bog-mosses or peat-mosses; abounding in bog- or peat-mosses. See Sphagnum.

Sphagnum (sfag'num), n. [NL. (Dillenius, 1741), < Gr. σφάγνος, also σφάκος, and φάσκος, φάσκον, a kind of moss.] 1. A genus of mosses, the peat- or bog-mosses, the only representative of the order Sphagnaceæ. For characters, see Sphagnaceæ. The plants of this genus are widely diffused over the temperate parts of the globe, and enter largely into the composition of peat. There are about 25 North American species and many varieties or forms, about the validity of which the best authorities differ widely. The most divergent forms may be distinguished by well-marked characters, but these seem to merge into one another by a complete series of connecting links. See *peat*¹, peat-moss, Bryaceæ.

2. [l. c.] A mass or quantity of moss of this genus: often used attributively: as, sphagnum moss; a sphagnum bog.

a, Fertile plant of Sphagnum cuspidatum, var. plumosum; b, the capsule of Sphagnum subsecundum; c, the antheridium of Sphagnum subsecundum; d, cells of the leaf of Sphagnum cymbifolium.

Sphagolobus (sfā-gol'ō-bus), n. [NL. (Cabanis, 1860), < Gr. σφαγή, the throat, + λοβός, lobe.] A genus of hornbills, of the family Bucerotidæ, characterized by the peculiar form of the casque and by the curly crest. The only species is S. atratus of western Africa, of a blackish color with the tail dark-green and broadly tipped with white.

sphalerite (sfal'ē-rīt), n. [< Gr. σφαλερός, slippery, uncertain (< σφάλλειν, cause to fall, throw down, trip: see fall, *fail*¹), + *-ite*²: so named because often confounded with more useful ores.] The native zinc sulphid more familiarly known as zinc-blende. See blende.

sphalerocarpium (sfal″e-rō-kär'pi-um), n.; pl. sphalerocarpia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. σφαλερός, slippery, uncertain (see sphalerite), + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., a name proposed for an accessory fruit, as that of Shepherdia, in which the achene is invested by a persistent succulent calyx, which assumes the appearance of a berry.

Sphargididæ (sfär-jid'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1839), < Sphargis (Sphargid-) + -idæ.] A family of chelonians, typified by the genus Sphargis, having a soft, thick, coriaceous carapace not consolidated by the bones, and clawless feet forming mere paddles; the soft-shelled turtles. Only one species is known, the luth, or leather-back turtle, which reaches a gigantic size. Preferably to be called Dermochelydidæ. Also Sphargidæ, Spargidina, Sphargidoidæ. See cut under leatherback.

Sphargis (sfär'jis), n. [NL. (Merrem, 1820).] The typical genus of Sphargididæ. The species is S. coriacea, the soft-shelled or leather-backed turtle, or trunk-turtle. An earlier and unexceptionable name, and therefore the onym of this genus, is Dermochelys. See cut under leatherback.

Sphecia (sfē'shi-ä), n. [NL. (Hübner, 1816), < Gr. σφήξ (σφηκ-), a wasp.] A genus of lepidopterous insects, of the family Ægeriidæ, having the abdomen moderate and no anal tuft; the hornet-moths. Two European species are the hornet-moth (S. apiformis) and the lunar hornet-moth (S. bembeciformis). See Sesia.

Sphecidæ (sfes'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., also erroneously Sphegidæ, < Sphex (Sphec-) + -idæ.] A family of fossorial hymenopterous insects, typified by the genus Sphex: same as Sphegidæ.

Sphecius (sfē'shi-us), n. [NL. (Dahlbom, 1843), < Gr. σφήξ (σφηκ-), a wasp.] A notable genus of digger-wasps, of the family Bembecidæ, having the middle tibiæ armed with two spurs at the apex, and the marginal cell of the fore wings lanceolate. The species are of large size and bright colors. S. speciosus is one of the largest of the Sphecius speciosus, natural size.

North American solitary wasps, and digs large cylindrical burrows which it stores with stung cicadas, particularly with the dog-day harvest-fly (Cicada tibicen).

Sphecotheres (sfē-kō-thē′rēz), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816, also Sphœotera and Sphœothera), < Gr. σφήξ (σφηκ-), a wasp, + θηρᾶν, hunt, chase.] One of two leading genera of passerine birds, of the family Oriolidæ, having the lores and circumocular region naked. There are 4 species, ranging in Australia, New Guinea, Timor, and the Kei Islands. The Australian is S. maxillaris; the Papuan is S. salvadorii; S. flaviventris inhabits the Kei Islands and parts of Australia; while S. viridis is found in Timor and Semao. Also called Picnorhamphus.

Sphegidæ (sfej′i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Westwood, 1840), irreg. < Sphex (Sphec-) + -idæ.] A family of fossorial hymenopters, or digger-wasps. The prothorax is narrowed anteriorly, and forms a sort of neck; the basal segment of the abdomen is narrowed into a long, smooth, round petiole; and the head and thorax are usually clothed with a long, thin pubescence. These wasps usually burrow into sand-banks, and provision their cells with caterpillars and spiders. Eighteen genera and about three hundred species are known. Also Specidæ. See sand-wasp, and cuts under digger-wasp, Ammophila, sand-dauber, and Pelopæus.

sphendone (sfen′dō-nē), n. [< Gr. σφενδόνη, a sling, a head-band, a hoop, etc.] In Gr. archæol.: (a) A form of head-band or fillet worn by women to confine the hair around and on the top of the head. It is characteristically broad in front and narrow behind, being thus opposite in its arrangement to the opisthosphendone. (b) An elliptical or semi-elliptical area, or any place of kindred form, as the auditorium of a theater; that end of a stadium which was curved or rounded.

The Messenian stadium, which is surrounded by colonnades, has 16 rows of seats in the sphendone.
C. O. Müller, Manual of Archæol. (trans.), § 290.

sphene (sfēn), n. [< F. sphène, in allusion to the wedge shape of the crystals, < Gr. σφήν, a wedge.] The mineral titanite. The transparent green, greenish-yellow, or yellow varieties frequently exhibit a play of colors as brilliant as that of the yellow or green diamond, showing a strong refractive and dispersive power on light. It is quite soft, the hardness being only 5.5. See titanite.

sphenethmoid (sfē-neth′moid), a. and n. [< sphen(oid) + ethmoid.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and the ethmoid bone; sphenethmoidal; ethmosphenoid: as, the sphenethmoid suture or articulation.—2. Representing or combining characters of both sphenoid and ethmoid: as, the sphenethmoid bone.

II. n. The sphenethmoid bone, as of the frog's skull: one of the cranial bones, situated in front of the parasphenoid. See girdle-bone, and cuts under Anura[2] and Rana.

Also spheno-ethmoid.

sphenethmoidal (sfē-neth-moi′dal), a. [< sphenethmoid + -al.] Same as sphenethmoid.—Sphenethmoidal nerve, a branch of the nasal nerve described by Luschka as passing through the posterior internal orbital canal to the mucous membrane of the posterior ethmoidal cells and the sphenoidal sinus. Called by Krause the posterior ethmoidal nerve.

sphenic (sfē′nik), a. [< Gr. σφήν, a wedge, + -ic.] Wedge-like.—Sphenic number, a number having three unequal factors.

sphenion (sfē′ni-on), n. [NL., < Gr. σφήν, a wedge.] The apex of the sphenoidal angle of the parietal bone, on the surface of the skull: so called by Von Török. See craniometry.

spheniscan (sfē-nis′kan), n. [< Spheniscus + -an.] A penguin or spheniscomorph; especially, a jackass-penguin of the restricted genus Spheniscus. See cut under Spheniscus.

Spheniscidæ (sfē-nis′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spheniscus + -idæ.] The penguins as a family of squamipennate or brevipennate palmiped natatorial birds, of the order Pygopodes; the only family of Spheniscomorphæ, Squamipennes, Impennes, or Ptilopteri, so strongly marked that it is regarded as representing a superfamily, order, or even superorder, though formerly included in the Alcidæ, or auk family. The wings are reduced to flippers, like a seal's or turtle's. They hang by the side, and cannot be closed like those of other birds; in swimming under water they are flapped alternately with a peculiar motion suggesting that of the blades of a screw propeller. They are covered with small scaly feathers in which no remiges can be distinguished, and their bones are peculiarly flat, and not hollow. The feet are four-toed and webbed, with very short broad tarsi, the bones of which are more separate than the metatarsals of any other birds. In walking or standing the whole tarsus rests on the ground, so that the birds are plantigrade; and in swimming under water the feet act mainly as rudders. The beak varies in form in different genera. The plumage is uniformly implanted in the skin, without any apteria; and there is a highly developed system of subcutaneous muscles, contributing to the sinuous movements of the birds under water, suggestive of those of the duck-mole. The feathers of the upper parts and wings are scaly, with thick, flattened shafts and slight webbing. The Spheniscidæ are confined to the southern hemisphere, and abound in cold temperate and antarctic waters, especially about the southern end of Africa and South America, where they live in communities, often of great extent. There are about 14 species, one of which reaches Brazil and another Peru. The generic forms are Aptenodytes, the king-penguins, of great size, with slender bill; Pygoscelis, a similar but long-tailed type; Dasyrhamphus, with extensively feathered bill; Eudyptula, of very small size; Eudyptes (or Catarractes), the rock-hoppers, which are crested, and hop instead of waddling; and Spheniscus, the jackass-penguins. There is a fossil penguin, Palæeudyptes antarcticus, from the Tertiary of the west coast of Nelson Island, which was a giant, 6 or 7 feet tall. Aptenodytidæ is a synonym. See the generic names, Spheniscomorphæ, and cuts under Eudyptes, metatarsus, penguin[1], Pygoscelis, Spheniscus, and Squamipennes.

Spheniscinæ (sfē-ni-sī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Spheniscus + -inæ.] The penguins: (a†) as a subfamily of Alcidæ; (b) as the only subfamily of Spheniscidæ.

spheniscine (sfē-nis′in), a. [< Spheniscus + -ine[1].] Of or pertaining to the Spheniscidæ; spheniscomorphic.

spheniscoid (sfē-nis′koid), a. [< Spheniscus + -oid.] Same as spheniscomorphic.

spheniscomorph (sfē-nis′kō-môrf), n. A penguin as a member of the Spheniscomorphæ.

Spheniscomorphæ (sfē-nis-kō-môr′fē), n. pl. [NL. (Huxley, 1867), < Spheniscus + Gr. μορφή, form.] The penguins as a group of schizognathous carinate birds, represented by the single family Spheniscidæ. See Spheniscidæ.

spheniscomorphic (sfē-nis-kō-môr′fik), a. [< Spheniscomorphæ + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Spheniscomorphæ. Also spheniscoid.

Spheniscus (sfē-nis′kus), n. [NL. (Brisson, 1760), < Gr. σφηνίσκος, dim. of σφήν, a wedge.] 1. In ornith., a genus of penguins, of the family Spheniscidæ, having a stout, compressed beak hooked at the end, and no crest; the jackass-penguins. There are several species, of medium size. S. demersus is found off the Cape of Good Hope. It is bluish-gray or slate-colored above, white below, with a dark mask and single collar cut off by a white band from the other colored parts, the collar extending as a stripe along the sides of the body. The Magellanic penguin, S. magellanicus, of South America, is similar, but has a double collar. S. humboldti is another, inhabiting the coast of Peru. S. minor is a very small species, only about 12 inches long, now placed in another genus, Eudyptula.

Cape Jackass-penguin (Spheniscus demersus).

2. In entom., a genus of heteromerous coleopterous insects, of the family Tenebrionidæ. Kirby, 1817.—3. [l. c.] In math., a sphenic number.

sphenobasilar (sfē-nō-bas′i-lär), a. [< spheno(id) + basilar.] Of or pertaining to the basisphenoid and the basioccipital or basilar process of the occipital bone; basilar, as the suture between these bones. See cuts under craniofacial, skull, and sphenoid.

sphenoccipital (sfē-nok-sip′i-tal), a. [< spheno(id) + occipital.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and the occipital bone; occipitosphenoid; sphenobasilar.

Sphenocercus (sfē-nō-sėr′kus), n. [NL. (G. R. Gray, 1840), < Gr. σφήν, a wedge, + κέρκος, a tail.] A genus of fruit-pigeons or Treroninæ, having the tail cuneate. Several species inhabit parts of Asia, Japan, and the East Indies, as S. sphenurus of the Himalayan region, S. sieboldi of Japan, S. korthalsi of Sumatra, S. apicauda of Nepal, S. oxyurus of Java and Borneo, S. formosæ of Formosa. The genus is also called Sphenurus, Sphenœnas, and Sphenotreron.

Wedge-tailed Pigeon (Sphenocercus sphenurus).

Sphenodon (sfē′nō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. σφήν, a wedge, + ὀδοίς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] 1. In mammal., a genus of extinct megatherioid edentates, or fossil sloths, remains of which occur in the bone-caves of South America. Lund, 1839.—2. In herpet.: (a†) A genus of extant rhynchocephalous lizards of New Zealand. S. punctatus is known as the tuatera. The name is synonymous with Hatteria. (b) [l. c.] A lizard of this genus. They resemble ordinary lizards externally, but have internal characters representative of an order (Rhynchocephalia). They are now restricted to certain localities in New Zealand, and live chiefly in holes in the sand or about stones on certain rocky islets, though they were formerly abundant in other places. They have been thinned out, it is said, chiefly by hogs. Three species are described. See cut under Hatteria.

sphenodont (sfē′nō-dont), a. and n. [< Sphenodon(t-).] I. a. Having the character of a sphenodon; of or pertaining to the Sphenodontidæ or Hatteriidæ.

II. n. A sphenodont lizard.

Sphenodontidæ (sfē-nō-don′ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphenodon(t-) + -idæ.] A family of rhynchocephalous reptiles, named from the genus Sphenodon: same as Hatteriidæ.

sphenodontoid (sfē-nō-don′toid), a. and n. [< Sphenodon(t-) + -oid.] Same as sphenodont.

Sphenœacus (sfē-nē-ā′kus), n. [NL. (Strickland, 1841), < Gr. σφήν, a wedge, + οἴαξ (οιακ-), a rudder.] A genus of aberrant reed-warblers, of uncertain systematic position. It is remarkable in having only ten tail-feathers, which are stiffened with spiny shafts, and whose webs are lax and decomposed. There are no rictal bristles (as in the related cinn-wren: see cut under Stipiturus). There are 6 species, of South Africa, New Zealand, and the Chatham Islands, as S. africanus, S. punctatus of New Zealand, and S. rufescens of the Chathams. Also Sphenæacus and Spheaura.

spheno-ethmoid (sfē-nō-eth′moid), a. and n. Same as sphenethmoid.

spheno-ethmoidal (sfē″nō-eth-moi′dal), a. Same as sphenethmoidal.

sphenofrontal (sfē-nō-fron′tal), a. [< spheno(id) + frontal.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and the frontal bone; frontosphenoid.—Sphenofrontal suture or articulation, in man, a long horizontal suture between the orbital plates of the frontal bone and the orbitosphenoids, and between the external angular processes of the frontal and the alisphenoids.

sphenogram (sfē′nō-gram), n. [< Gr. σφήν, a wedge, + γράμμα, a writing, < γράφειν, write.] A cuneiform or arrow-headed character.

sphenographer (sfē-nog′ra-fėr), n. [< sphenograph-y + -er[1].] One versed in sphenography. [Little used.]

sphenographic (sfē-nō-graf′ik), a. [< sphenograph-y + -ic.] Of or pertaining to sphenography.

sphenographist (sfē-nog′ra-fist), n. [< sphenograph-y + -ist.] Same as sphenographer.

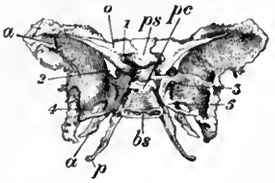
sphenography (sfē-nog′ra-fi), n. [< Gr. σφήν, a wedge, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] The study and description of cuneiform writings. [Rare.]

sphenoid (sfē′noid), a. and n. [< Gr. σφηνοειδής, wedge-shaped, < σφήν, a wedge, + εἶδος, form.] I. a. Wedge-shaped; wedge-like; specifically, in anat., noting certain cranial bones. See II., 2.—Minimum sphenoid diameter, the least transverse diameter of the skull, measured between the temporal fossæ.

II. n. 1. In crystal., a wedge-shaped crystalline form contained under four equal isosceles triangles. It is the hemihedral form of the square pyramid of the tetragonal system.—2. In anat., a large and important compound bone of the skull: so called from its shape and connections in man. The cranial articulations are with the occipital, temporal, parietal, frontal, and ethmoid; the facial, with the vomer, malar, palate, and sometimes the superior maxillary. It has a solid median and inferior body, and bears on each side two pairs of wings, greater and lesser, separated by the sphenoidal fissure from each other. It is a collection of bones, not a single bone, its composition including, in man and the mammals generally, (a) a basisphenoid, the principal posterior part of the body of the bone, bearing (b) the alisphenoids, the pair of greater wings, these elements forming with the parietal bones the second or parietal segment of the cranium; (c) the presphenoid, the lesser anterior moiety of the body of the bone, bearing (d) the orbitosphenoids, the pair of lesser wings, or processes of Ingrassias, these forming with the frontal bones the third or frontal cranial segment; (e) a pair of pterygoid bones, the so-called internal pterygoid processes; (f) a pair of spongy bones, the sphenoturbinals. The development of the human sphenoid is from 14 centers of ossification, 8 in the postsphenoid division, and 6 in the presphenoid division. Below mammals, in Sauropsida (birds and reptiles), the sphenoid is simplified by subtraction of the pterygoids, which then form permanently distinct bones, and complicated by the addition of other elements, especially an underlying membrane-bone called the parasphenoid. In Ichthyopsida (amphibians and fishes) further and very great modifications occur. To the sphenoid of man are attached twelve pairs of muscles.



Human Sphenoid Bone, from above.

a,a, alisphenoid, or greater wing, the lower letter a pointing to its continuation as the external pterygoid process; bs, basisphenoid, or main body of the bone, bs pointing to the spheoccipital articulation; pc, postclinoid processes, bounding the pituitary fossa or sella Turcica behind; ps, presphenoid, or fore part of the body of the bone; o, orbitosphenoid, or lesser wing; p, internal pterygoid process; 1, optic foramen; 2, sphenoidal fissure, or foramen lacerum anterius; 3, foramen rotundum; 4, foramen ovale; 5, groove for internal carotid artery, or cavernous groove.

sphenoidal (sfē-noi′dal), a. [< sphenoid + -al.] Same as sphenoid.—Sphenoidal angle. See craniometry.—Sphenoidal crest, the median thin ridge projecting from the anterior surface of the sphenoid bone to articulate with the perpendicular plate of the ethmoid. Also called ethmoidal crest.—Sphenoidal fissure. See fissure.—Sphenoidal fontanelle, the membranous interspace in the infant skull at the junction of the squamous suture with the coronal suture. It often contains a Wormian bone.—Sphenoidal hemihedrism. See hemihedrism.—Sphenoidal process. See process.—Sphenoidal rostrum. (a) The beak, or a beak-like part, of the sphenoid bone. In man it is a vertical ridge upon which the vomer rides, forming the sphenovomerine suture or schindylesis. (b) In birds, a rostrate part of the skull which appears to be chiefly, if not entirely, developed from the parasphenoid.—Sphenoidal septum. See septum sphenoidale, under septum.—Sphenoidal sinuses. See sinus.—Sphenoidal spongy bones, the sphenoturbinals.

sphenoides (sfē-noi′dēz), n. [NL., < Gr. σφηνοειδής, wedge-shaped: see sphenoid.] 1. In anat., the sphenoid bone: more fully called os sphenoides.—2. [cap.] A genus of cœlenterates.

sphenoideum (sfē-noi′dē-um), n.; pl. sphenoidea (-ä). [NL.: see sphenoid.] The sphenoid bone, or os sphenoideum.

sphenoido-auricular (sfē-noi″dō-â-rik′ū-lär), a. In craniom., noting the ratio of the minimum sphenoidal diameter of the skull to the minimum auricular diameter: as, the sphenoido-auricular index.

sphenoidofrontal (sfē-noi″dō-fron′tal), a. In craniom., noting the ratio of the minimum sphenoidal diameter of the skull to the minimum frontal diameter.

sphenoidoparietal (sfē-noi″dō-pā-rī′e-tal), a. In craniom., noting the ratio of the minimum sphenoidal diameter of the skull to the maximum parietal diameter.

sphenomalar (sfē-nō-mā′lär), a. [< spheno(id) + malar.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and malar bones: as, the sphenomalar articulation, between the alisphenoid and malar bones.—Sphenomalar suture. See suture.

sphenomaxillary (sfē-nō-mak′si-lā-ri), a. [< spheno(id) + maxillary.] Relating to the sphenoid and superior maxillary bones.—Sphenomaxillary fissure, fossa, suture, etc. See the nouns.

Sphenomonadidæ (sfē″nō-mō-nad′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphenomonas (-monad-) + -idæ.] A family of dimastigate eustomatous infusorians, represented by the genus Sphenomonas. These animalcules are free-swimming; the cuticular surface is indurated; flagella are two in number, one long and one short, both vibratile and extended anteriorly; the oral aperture is succeeded by a distinct tubular pharynx; the endoplasm is colorless, granular; an endoplast and contractile vesicle are conspicuous.

Sphenomonas (sfē-nom′ō-nas), n. [NL., < Gr. σφήν, a wedge, + μονάς, solitary, a unit: see monad.] The representative genus of Sphenomonadidæ. These animalcules are of persistent polyhedral prismatic figure, with four or more longitudinal carinæ, and two vibratile flagella, a long and a short one. Two fresh-water species are S. quadrangularis and S. octocostatus.

sphenonchus (sfē-nong′kus), n.; pl. sphenonchi (-kī). [NL., < Gr. σφήν, a wedge, + ὄγκος, bulk, mass.] In ichth.: (a) One of the hooked dermal spines of the cephalic armature of certain fossil fishes, as of the genera Hybodus and Acrodus. (b†) [cap.] A lapsed genus of fishes, founded on sphenonchi by Agassiz in 1843.

spheno-orbital, spheno-orbitar (sfē-nō-ôr′bi-tal, -tär), a. Same as sphenorbital.

sphenopalatine (sfē-nō-pal′a-tin), a. [< spheno(id) + *palatine*2.] Pertaining to the sphenoid and palatine bones. Also sphenopalatal, sphenopalatinate.—Internal sphenopalatine nerve. Same as nasopalatine nerve (which see, under nasopalatine).—Sphenopalatine artery, a branch arising from the third or sphenomaxillary portion of the internal maxillary artery. It passes through the sphenopalatine foramen into the cavity of the nose, and is distributed to the nasal mucous membrane and the membranes of the antrum, ethmoid, and sphenoid cells. Also called nasal artery.—Sphenopalatine foramen, ganglion, notch. See the nouns.—Sphenopalatine nerves, two small branches of the superior maxillary nerve to the sphenopalatine or Meckel's ganglion.—Sphenopalatine vein, a small vein entering the pterygoid plexus.

sphenoparietal (sfē″nō-pā-rī′e-tal), a. [< spheno(id) + parietal.] Pertaining to the sphenoid and parietal bones: as, the sphenoparietal suture.—Sphenoparietal sinus, a small vessel which communicates with the cavernous sinus and middle meningeal veins, and rests in a groove on the under side of the lesser wing of the sphenoid. Breschet.—Sphenoparietal suture. See suture.

sphenopetrosal (sfē″nō-pet-rō′sal), a. [< spheno(id) + petrosal.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and petrosal bones; petrosphenoidal.—Sphenopetrosal suture. See suture.

sphenopharyngeus (sfē″nō-far-in-jē′us), n. [< spheno(id) + pharyngeus.] An occasional elevator muscle of the pharynx which arises from the spine of the sphenoid.

Sphenophorus sculptilis.

a, adult beetle, dorsal view; b, adult beetle, side view in outline (hair-line shows natural size); c, pattern of elytral sculpture, still more enlarged.

Sphenophorus (sfē-nof′ō-rus), n. [NL. (Schönherr, 1838), < Gr. σφήν, a wedge, + -φόρος, < φέρειν = E. *bear*1.] A notable genus of rhynchophorous beetles, of many species and very wide distribution, having the anterior coxæ narrowly separated, and the body beneath glabrous. Nearly 200 species are known, of which 30 inhabit America north of Mexico. Many of them breed in the roots of plants, and so may become pests. The adult beetles also often feed upon plants. Thus S. sculptilis feeds upon corn, and S. pulchellus upon the cocklebur (Xanthium).

a, adult beetle, dorsal view; b, adult beetle, side view in outline. (Hair-line shows natural size.)

Sphenophyllum (sfē-nō-fil′um), n. [NL. (Brongniart, 1822), < Gr. σφήν, a wedge, + φύλλον, a leaf.] A genus of fossil plants, occurring throughout the whole thickness of the coal-measures, both in Europe and in the United States, and supposed to have been found also in the Lower Silurian, near Cincinnati in Ohio. It is a herbaceous plant, with whorls of wedge-shaped leaves, springing from enlarged articulations, the fructification in cylindrical spikes, with bracts curved upward in a sharp flexure from near the base, and globular sporanges in the axils of the bracts. Sphenophyllum, first thought by Brongniart to belong to the gymnosperms, is now believed to constitute a peculiar type of vegetation, regarded by some authors as related to the rhizocarps, by others as connected with the Calamariæ through Asterophyllites.

sphenopterid (sfē-nop′te-rid), n. A fern of the genus Sphenopteris.

Sphenopteris (sfē-nop′te-ris), n. [NL. (Brongniart, 1822), < Gr. σφήν, a wedge, + πτέρις (πτεριδ-), a fern: see Pteris.] A genus of fossil ferns, very widely distributed and very abundant, especially in the (Carboniferous) coal-measures, but ranging from the Devonian to the Middle Cretaceous. "These are elegant ferns, very numerous in species, and most difficult to discriminate" (Dawson). Almost nothing is known of the fructification of Sphenopteris, and the numerous specific distinctions which have been made are generally derived from the subdivisions of the fronds, and the shape and venation of the pinnules. Lesquereux divides the sphenopterids into three subdivisions: (a) the pecopterid sphenopterids, species of which group were referred to Pecopteris by Brongniart, of which the fronds have their ultimate pinnæ pinnately deeply lobed, the lobes connate to the middle or higher, and the veins pinnately divided, as in Pecopteris; (b) Sphenopteris proper, of which the pinnæ are more deeply divided in lobes, or pinnately narrowed and decurrent at the base, and generally dentate or crenate at the apex; (c) the hymenophyllite sphenopterids, which he thinks should constitute a distinct genus. See cut under fern.

sphenopterygoid (sfē-nop-ter′i-goid), a. [< spheno(id) + pterygoid.] Common to the sphenoid and pterygoid bones. Also plerygosphenoid.

sphenorbital (sfē-nôr′bi-tal), a. [< sphen(oid) + orbital.] Pertaining to the sphenoid bone and the orbits of the eyes; orbitosphenoid. The sphenorbital parts of the sphenoid are the lesser wings, or orbitosphenoids; the sphenorbital fissure is the sphenoidal fissure, or anterior lacerate foramen. See orbitosphenoid. Also spheno-orbital and spheno-orbitar.

Sphenorhynchus (sfē-nō-ring′kus), n. [NL., prop. Sphenorrhynchus (Hemprich and Ehrenberg, 1829), < Gr. σφήν, a wedge, + ῥύγχος, a snout.] 1. A genus of Ciconiidæ, the wedge-billed storks, having a sharp straight bill with a membrane saddled on the base of the upper maudible, and no ambiens muscle. The only species is the white-bellied stork or simbil, S. abdimi, also called Abdimia sphenorhyncha, of greenish and brownish-purple color and white below, the bill tipped with orange-red. It inhabits Africa, nests in trees, and is regarded with veneration by the natives. See cut under simbil.

2†. A genus of South American dendrocolaptine birds, now called Glyphorhynchus. Maximilian, 1831.—3†. A genus of reptiles. Tschudi, 1838.

sphenosquamosal (sfē″nō-skwā-mō′sal), a. [< spheno(id) + squamosal.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and the squamous part of the temporal bone; squamosphenoidal.

sphenotemporal (sfē-nō-tem′pō-ral), a. [< spheno(id) + *temporal*2.] In anat., of or belonging to the temporal and sphenoid bones. Also temporosphenoid.—Sphenotemporal suture. See suture.

sphenotic (sfē-nō′tik), a. and n. [< sphen(oid) + otic.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the sphenoid bone and the otic capsule, or hard parts of the auditory organ: as, a sphenotic ossification in various fishes. See cut under teleost.

II. n. In ornith., a postfrontal process of bone, or a separate ossification, developed in relation with sphenoidal and otic elements, entering into the posterior boundary of the orbital cavity.

sphenotresia (sfē-nō-trē′si-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. σφήν, a wedge, + τρῆσις, perforation, < τετραίνειν (√ τρα), perforate.] The breaking up of the basal portion of the fetal skull in craniotomy.

sphenotribe (sfē′nō-trīb), n. [< Gr. σφήν, a wedge, + τρίβειν, rub, bruise.] The instrument used in performing sphenotresia.

sphenoturbinal (sfē-nō-tėr′bi-nal), a. and n. [< spheno(id) + turbinal.] I. a. Sphenoidal and turbinated or whorled or scroll-like; sphenoturbinate: specifically applied, conformably with ethmoturbinal and maxilloturbinal, to the sphenoidal spongy bones. See II.

II. n. One of the sphenoidal spongy bones; one of a pair of small bones situated in front of the body of the sphenoid, in man at birth solid, nodular, distinct from each other and from the sphenoid, afterward fused with the body of the sphenoid as delicate spongy or scroll-like bones which take part in forming the sphenoidal sinuses. Their homologues in other animals are questionable.

sphenoturbinate (sfē-nō-tėr′bi-nāt), a. [< spheno(id) + turbinate.] Same as sphenoturbinal.

sphenovomerine (sfē-nō-vom′e-rin), a. [< spheno(id) + vomerine.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid bone and the vomer: as, the sphenovomerine suture or schindylesis.

Sphenozamites (sfē″nō-za-mī′tēz), n. [NL. (Brongniart, 1849), < Gr. σφήν, a wedge, + NL. Zamites, q. v.] A genus of fossil plants belonging to the cycads, ranging from the Permian to the Jurassic inclusive. They are said by Schimper to bear some resemblance to the problematical Noeggerathia, and, among living forms, to be most nearly analogous to Zamia and Encephalartos. See Zamites.

Sphenura (sfē-nū′rä), n. [NL., < Gr. σφήν, a wedge, + οὐρά, a tail.] 1. In ornith., a generic name variously applied. (a) An Australian genus of aberrant reed-warblers, with only ten tail-feathers and three pairs of strong recurved rictal bristles. It is quite near Sphenœacus (which see), and in part synonymous therewith. There are 3 species, S. brachyptera, S. longirostris, and S. broadbenti. Lichtenstein, 1823. (b†) A genus of South American synallaxine birds now called Eusphenura and Thripophaga. Spix, 1824; Sundevall, 1835. (c†) A genus of Indian and African birds related to neither of the foregoing, now called Argya (or Argia) and Malcolmia. Bonaparte, 1854.

2. In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects. Dejean, 1834.

spheral (sfē′ral), a. [< L. sphæralis, of or pertaining to a sphere, globular, < sphæra, < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere: see sphere.] 1. Rounded or formed like a sphere; sphere-shaped; hence, symmetrical; perfect in form. —2. Of or pertaining to the spheres or heavenly bodies; moving or revolving like the spheres; hence, harmonious.

Well I know that all things move
To the spheral rhythm of love.
Whittier, Andrew Rykman's Prayer.

The spheral souls that move
Through the ancient heaven of song-illumined air.
Swinburne.

Carlyle had no faith in . . . the astronomic principle by which the systems are kept in poise in the spheral harmony. The Century, XXVI. 538.

sphērality (sfē-ral′i-ti), n. [< spheral + -ity.] The state of being spheral, or having the form of a sphere. [Rare.]

spheraster (sfē′ras-tėr), n. [NL., < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + ἀστήρ, a star.] In sponges, a regular polyact or stellate spicule whose rays coalesce into a spherical figure, as in the genus Geodia; an aster with a thick spherical body. W. J. Sollas.

spheration (sfē-rā′shọn), n. [< sphere + -ation.] Formation into a sphere; specifically, the process by which cosmic matter is formed into a globular or planetary body. [Recent.]

The physical relations accompanying the spheration of a ring are not such as to determine uniformly either direct or retrograde motion. Winchell, World-Life, p. 123.

sphere (sfēr), n. [Early mod. E. also sphear, spheare, also sphære (with vowel as in L.); earlier (and still dial.) spere, < ME. spere, < OF. espere, later sphere, F. sphère = Pr. espera = Sp. esfera = Pg. esphera = It. sfera = D. sfeer = G. sphäre = Dan. sfære = Sw. sfer, < L. sphæra, ML. also sphera, spera, < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, globe, sphere, applied to a playing-ball, a sphere as a geometrical figure, the terrestrial globe, the earth, also an artificial globe (so in Strabo, the notion that the earth is a sphere appearing first prob. in Plato), also a star or planet (Plutarch), also a hollow sphere, one of the concentric spheres supposed to revolve around the earth, also a ball (of the eye), a pill, etc.; perhaps lit. 'that which is tossed about' (applied first to a playing-ball), for σφάρυα* for σπάρυα, < σπείρειν, scatter, throw about (see sperm, spore[1]); or perhaps connected with σπεῖρα, a coil, ball, spire (see spire[2]).] 1. In geom., a solid figure generated by the revolution of a semicircle about its diameter. This is substantially Euclid's definition. The modern definition is a quadric surface having contact with the absolute throughout a conic, and therefore everywhere equidistant from a center. The surface of a sphere is $4\pi R^2$, where R is the radius; its volume is $\frac{4}{3}\pi R^3$.

Hence —2. A rounded body, approximately spherical; a ball; a globe.

The Lieutenant's evidence was as round, complete, and lucid as a Japanese sphere of rock-crystal.
O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 55.

3. An orbienlar body representing the earth or the apparent heavens, or illustratiug their astronomical relations. Hence —4. The visible supernal region; the upper air; the heavens; the sky. [Poetical.]

Then shall the righteous shine like glorious starres Within the sphear of heaven.
Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 6.

Sweet Echo, . . .
Sweet queen of parley, daughter of the sphere.
Milton, Comus, l. 241.

I,
An eagle, clang an eagle to the sphere.
Tennyson, Princess, iii.

5. One of the supposed concentric and eccentric revolving rigid and transparent shells called crystalline, in which, according to the old astronomers (following Eudoxus), the stars, sun, moon, and planets were severally set, and by which they were carried in such a manner as to produce their apparent motions. The term is now generally restricted to the sphere of the fixed stars, and is recognized as a convenient fiction. It is also loosely applied to the planets themselves.

After shewede he hym the ayne speres;
And after that the melodye herde he
That cometh of thilke speres thryes three,
That welle is of musik and melodye
In this world here and cause of harmonye.
Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 59.

Stand still, you ever-moving spheres of heaven!
Marlowe, Doctor Faustus, v. 4.

Hence —6†. An orbieular field or course of movement; an orbit, as that of a heavenly body or of the eye; a circuit.

As Mars in three-score yeares doth run his spheare, . . .
The spheare of Cupid fourty yeares containes.
Spenser, Sonnets, lx.

Make thy two eyes, like stars, start from their spheres.
Shak., Hamlet, i. 5. 17.

7. Place or sceno of action; tho space within which movement is made or operations are carried on; a circumscribed region of action: as, the sphere of a mission; the spheres (fuller, spheres of influence) of the different European powers and trading companies in Africa.

The foure elementes wherof the body of man is compacte . . . be set in their places called spheris, higher or lower accordynge to the soueraintie of theyr natures.
Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, i. 1.

All this while the King had mov'd within his own Sphere, and had done nothing out of the Realm.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 403.

Our South African sphere seems better suited for European settlement than is the Tunisian protectorate of France. Sir C. W. Dilke, Probs. of Greater Britain, v.

8. Position or rank in society; position or class with reference to social distinctions.

Pleas'd, or not pleas'd, if we be Englands King,
And mightiest in the Spheare in which we moove, Wee'le shine alone, this Phaeton cast downe.
Heywood, Royal King (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 29).

I saw her [Marie Antoinette] just above the horizon, decorating and cheering the elevated sphere she just began to move in. Burke, Rev. in France.

9. Circuit or radius, as of knowledge, influence, or activity; definite or circumscribed range; determinate limit of any mental or physical course: as, the sphere of diplomacy.

This being wholly out of my sphere, I can give no account of them. Dampier, Voyages, II. i. 126.

Nature to each allots his proper Sphere.
Congreve, Of Pleasing.

Armillary sphere. See armillary. —Axis of a sphere. See axis[1]. —Circle of the sphere. See circle. —Colloid, dialing, direct sphere. See the qualifying words. —Copernican sphere, an armillary sphere with the addition of a second sphere representing the sun, central to a divided circle representing the ecliptic. —Doctrine of the sphere, the elements of the geometry of figures drawn upon the surface of a sphere. —Epidermic spheres. Same as epithelial pearls (which see, under pearl). —Geometry of spheres, a branch of geometry in which the lines of Plücker's geometry of lines are replaced by spheres, and the intersections of lines by the contact of spheres. —Harmony or music of the spheres. See harmony. —Logical sphere, the subject or ultimate antecedent of a statement, or the objects which a term denotes. —Magic sphere. See magic. —Oblique sphere, the sphere of the heavens, or another sphere representing that, as it appears at a station where the angle between the equator and the horizon is oblique. The right sphere is the same sphere for an equatorial station where the angle is a right angle, and the parallel sphere is the same where the angle vanishes —that is, for a polar station. —Osculating sphere of a non-plane curve, the sphere through four consecutive points of the curve. —Parallel circles on a sphere. See parallel. —Parallel sphere. See oblique sphere. —Power of a sphere in regard to another, the squared distance of the two centers less the sum of the squares of the radii. Clifford. —Projection of the sphere. See map-projection, under projection. —Radical sphere, a sphere orthogonally cutting four spheres having their centers at the summits of the tetrahedron of coördinates. —Right sphere. See oblique sphere. —Sector of a sphere. See sector. —Segmentation sphere. See segmentation. —Segment of a sphere. See segment. —Sphere at infinity. See infinity, 3. —Twelve-point sphere. (a) A sphere (discovered by Prouhet in 1863) belonging to a tetrahedron in which the four perpendiculars from the summits upon the opposite faces intersect in one point, this sphere passing through the four feet of these perpendiculars and consequently also through the centers of gravity of the four faces, and through the mid-points of the lines from the vertices to the common intersections of the perpendiculars aforesaid. (b) More generally, a sphere (discovered in 1884 by the Italian mathematician Intrigila) belonging to any tetrahedron, and passing through the four feet of the perpendiculars from the summits upon the opposite faces, and consequently also through the mid-points of the lines from the summits to the center of the hyperboloid of which these perpendiculars are generators, and through the orthogonal projections of these points upon the opposite faces. =Syn. 1-3. Orb, Ball, etc. See globe.

sphere (sfēr), v. t.; pret. and pp. sphered, ppr. sphering. [< sphere, n.] 1. To make into a sphere; make spherical; round, or round out; fill out completely.

Blow, villain, till thy sphered bias cheek
Outswell the colic of puff'd Aquilon.
Shak., T. and C., iv. 5. 8.

2. To place in a sphere or among the spheres; ensphere.

And therefore is the glorious planet Sol
In noble eminence enthroned, and sphered
Amidst the other. Shak., T. and C., i. 3. 90.

Light . . . from her native east
To journey through the sery gloom began,
Sphered in a radiant cloud; for yet the sun
Was not. Milton, P. L., vii. 247.

Because I would have reach'd yon, had you been Sphered up with Cassiopeia. Tennyson, Princess, iv.

3. To inclose as in a sphere or orbit; encircle; engirdle.

When any towne is spher'd
With siege of such a foe as kils men's minds.
Chapman, Iliad, xviii. 185.

4. To pass or send as in a sphere or orbit; circulate. [Rare.]

We'l still sit up,
Sphering about the wassail cup
To all those times
Which gave me honour for my rhimes.
Herrick, His Age.

sphere-crystals (sfēr′kris″talz), n. pl. In bot., same as sphæraphides.

sphereless (sfēr′les), a. [< sphere + -less.] Having no sphere; wandering; unrestrained.

Let the horsemen's scimitars
Wheel and flash, like sphereless stars,
Thirsting to eclipse their burning
In a sea of death and mourning.
Shelley, Masque of Anarchy, st. 79.

sphere-yeast (sfēr′yēst), n. In bot., an aggregation of certain sprouting forms of the genus Mucor: formerly so called from a resemblance in shape to the saccharomycete of yeast.

spheric (sfer′ik), a. [= F. sphérique = Sp. esférico = Pg. espherico = It. sferico, < L. sphæricus, < Gr. σφαιρικός, of or pertaining to a ball, < σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere: see sphere.] Of or pertaining to a sphere or the spheres; sphere-like; spherical.

Up the spheric circles, circle above circle.
Mrs. Browning, Drama of Exile.

Let any sculptor hew us out the most ravishing combination of tender curves and spheric softness that ever stood for woman. S. Lanier, The English Novel, p. 273.

spherical (sfer′i-kal), a. [< spheric + -al.] 1. Bounded by or having the form of the surface of a sphere: as, a spherical body; a spherical surface; a spherical shell.

We must know the reason of the spherical figures of the drops. Glanville.

2. Pertaining or relating to a sphere or spheres, or to sphericity: as, a spherical segment or section; spherical trigonometry. —3†. Relating to the planets; planetary, in the astrological sense.

We make guilty of our disasters the sun, the moon, and the stars: as if we were villains by necessity; fools by heavenly compulsion; knaves, thieves, and treachers by spherical predominance. Shak., Lear, i. 2. 134.

Adjunct spherical function. See function. —Center of spherical curvature. See center[1]. —Concave spherical mirror. See mirror, 2. —Line of spherical curvature. See line[2]. —Spherical aberration. See aberration, 4. —Spherical angle. See angle[3]. —Spherical bracketing, in arch., an arrangement of brackets for the support of lath-and-plaster work forming a spherical surface. —Spherical compasses, a kind of calipers for measuring globular bodies, variously constructed. —Spherical complex, the aggregate of all the spheres in space fulfilling a single geometrical condition. —Spherical congruence, the aggregate of all the spheres in space fulfilling two geometrical conditions. —Spherical conic section. See conic. —Spherical coördinates. See coördinate. —Spherical curvature, epicycloid, excess, function, geometry. See the nouns. —Spherical cyclic, a curve which is the intersection of a sphere with a quadric surface. —Spherical group, the spherical complex determined by a linear equation between the coördinates and the power of the center of the variable circle. —Spherical harmonic. Same as Laplace's function (which see, under function). —Spherical indicatrix. See indicatrix. —Spherical inversion. See geometrical inversion, under inversion.—Spherical lune, the portion of the surface of a sphere included between two great circles.—Spherical nucleus. Same as nucleus globosus (which see, under nucleus).—Spherical pencil, a singly infinite continuous series of spheres determined like a spherical group, but by three equations.—Spherical polygon. See polygon.—Spherical representation, a mode of continuous correspondence between the points of a surface and the points of a sphere, each radius of the sphere through the center representing the parallel normal of the surface. Any part of the sphere considered as thus representing a part of the surface is called its spherical image.—Spherical saw, a saw made in the form of a segment of a sphere, used for sawing out curvilinear work. See cut d under saw[1].—Spherical sclere. See sclere and spheraster.—Spherical-shot machine, a machine for finishing cannon-balls by molding and pressing to a true spherical form. E. H. Knight.—Spherical surface-harmonic. See harmonic.—Spherical triangle, trigonometry, etc. See the nouns.

sphericality (sfer-i-kal′i-ti), n. [< spherical + -ity.] Spherical form; sphericity. N. A. Rev., CXXVI. 375. [Rare.]

spherically (sfer′i-kal-i), adv. In the form of a sphere, or of part of a sphere; so as to be spherical.

sphericalness (sfer′i-kal-nes), n. The state or property of being spherical; sphericity. [Rare.]

sphericity (sfē-ris′i-ti), n. [= F. sphéricité; as spheric + -ity.] The character of being in the shape of a sphere.

sphericle (sfer′i-kl), n. [Dim. of sphere.] A small sphere; a spherule. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

spherics (sfer′iks), n. [Pl. of spheric (see -ics).] Geometry of figures drawn on the surface of a sphere; specifically, spherical trigonometry.

spheriform (sfē′ri-fôrm), a. [< L. sphæra, sphere, + forma, form.] Formed or existing as a sphere; sphere-shaped; spherical. Cudworth, Intellectual System, II. 23. [Rare.]

spherocobaltite (sfē-rō-kō′bâl-tīt), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + E. cobalt + -ite[2].] Carbonate of cobalt, a rare mineral occurring in small spherical masses with concentric radiated structure, and having a peach-blossom red color.

spheroconic (sfē-rō-kon′ik), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + κῶνος, a cone: see conic.] A non-plane curve, the intersection of a sphere with a quadric cone having its vertex at the center of the sphere.—Cyclic arcs of the spheroconic, the intersections of the cyclic planes of the cone with the sphere.—Reciprocal spheroconic, the envelop of the great circles of which the points on the first spheroconic are the poles.

spherocrystal (sfē-rō-kris′tal), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + κρύσταλλος, crystal.] 1. In lithol., a mineral occurring in spherical form with fibrous-radiate structure.—2. pl. In bot., same as sphæraphides.

spherodactyl (sfē-rō-dak′til), a. Of or pertaining to the genus Sphærodactylus, as a geeko.

spherogastric (sfē-rō-gas′trik), a. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + γαστήρ, stomach.] Having a spherical or globular abdomen, as a spider; of or pertaining to the Sphærogastra. See cut under honey-bearer.

spherograph (sfē′rō-grāf), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + γράφειν, write.] A nautical instrument consisting of a stereographic projection of the sphere upon a disk of pasteboard, in which the meridians and parallels of latitude are laid down to single degrees. By the aid of this projection, and a ruler and index, the angular position of a ship at any place, and the distance sailed, may be readily and accurately determined on the principle of great-circle sailing.

spheroid (sfē′roid), n. [Also sphæroid; = F. sphéroïde, < Gr. σφαιροειδής, like a ball or sphere, globular, < σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + εἶδος, form.] 1. A geometrical body approaching to a sphere, but not perfectly spherical.—2. In geom., a solid generated by the revolution of an ellipse about one of its axes. When the generating ellipse revolves about its longer or major axis, the spheroid is prolate or oblong; when about its less or minor axis, the spheroid is oblate. The earth is an oblate spheroid—that is, flattened at the poles, so that its polar diameter is shorter than its equatorial diameter. (See earth[1], 1.) The same figure is assumed by the other planets; hence the properties of the oblate spheroid are of great importance in geodesy and astronomy.—Universal spheroid, a surface generated by the revolution of an ellipse about any diameter.

spheroidal (sfē-roi′dal), a. [< spheroid + -al.] 1. Of or pertaining to, or having the form of, a spheroid.—2. In crystal., globose; bounded by several convex faces.—3. In entom., round and prominent, appearing like a ball or sphere partly buried in the surface: as, spheroidal eyes; spheroidal coxæ.—Spheroidal bracketing, in arch., bracketing which has a spheroidal surface.—Spheroidal epithelium. See epithelium.—Spheroidal state or condition, the condition of water or other liquid when, on being placed on a highly heated surface, as red-hot metal, it assumes the form of a more or less flattened spheroid, and evaporates without ebullition. The spheroid in this condition does not touch the surface of the metal, but floats on a layer of its own vapor, and evaporates rapidly from its exposed surface. It is heated mainly by radiation from the hot surface, since the layer of intervening vapor conducts heat very feebly. The formation of a layer of non-conducting vapor explains why it is possible to dip the wetted hand into molten iron with impunity. It is sometimes spoken of as the caloric or calorific paradox.

spheroidally (sfē-roi′dal-i), adv. In a spheroidal manner; so as to form a spheroid or spheroids.

> The great mass . . . is largely built up of spheroidally jointed rock. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLIV. 450.

spheroidic (sfē-roi′dik), a. [= F. sphéroïdique; as spheroid + -ic.] Same as spheroidal. [Rare.]

spheroidical (sfē-roi′di-kal), a. [< spheroidic + -al.] Same as spheroidal. [The usual old form.]

> The same spheroidical form. Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 67.

spheroidicity (sfē-roi-dis′i-ti), n. [< spheroidic + -ity.] The state or character of being spheroidal.

Spheroma, n. See Sphæroma.

spheromere (sfē′rō-mēr), n. [Also sphæromere; < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + μέρος, a part.] One of the radially arranged parts or symmetrical segments of any radiate; an actinomere. Perhaps the most remarkable spheromeres are those two which, in the Venus's-girdle, give that ctenophoran a ribbon-like figure by their enormous development. See cut under Cestum.

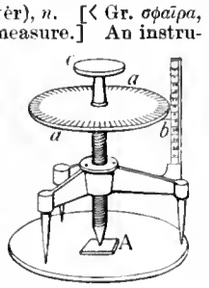
spherometer (sfē-rom′e-tėr), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for measuring the radii of spheres; a sphere-measurer. It is of especial service to opticians in determining the focal lengths, etc., of lenses. The common form (see figure) consists of a vertical screw c, with a large graduated head a a, turning in a socket supported by three legs whose hard steel points are exactly equidistant. The fixed scale b at the side, together with the graduated screw-head, makes it possible to measure with great accuracy the distance between the extremity of the screw and the plane passing through the ends of the three supports, when, for example, all the points are in contact with the surface of the sphere. If, in addition, the distance between the ends of the supports is known, a simple calculation gives the radius of the sphere. The same instrument may also be used to determine with precision the thickness of a plate, as (in the figure) A, placed upon a horizontal surface.



Spherometer.

spheromian (sfē-rō′mi-an), a. and n. [< Spheroma + -ian.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Sphæroma or the Sphæromidæ.

II. n. A globe-slater.

Also spelled sphæromian.

spheropolar (sfē-rō-pō′lär), a. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, sphere, + E. polar.] Reciprocal relatively to a sphere. The plane through the points of contact of a cone with a sphere is the spheropolar of the vertex.

spherosiderite (sfē-rō-sid′e-rīt), n. [Also sphærosiderite; < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + σιδηρίτης, of iron: see siderite.] A variety of the iron carbonate siderite, occurring in globular concretionary forms.

spherospore (sfē′rō-spōr), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + E. spore.] In bot., same as tetraspore.

spherular (sfer′ō-lär), a. [< spherule + -ar[3].] 1. Having the form of a spherule; resembling a spherule.—2. Of or pertaining to a spherulite; spherulitic.

> Spherular bodies consisting of radially-aggregated fibres of a single mineral. Nature, XXXIX. 315.

spherulate (sfer′ō-lāt), a. [< spherule + -ate[1].] In entom., having one or more rows of minute rounded tubercles; studded with spherules.

spherule (sfer′ōl), n. [Also sphærule; < L. sphærula, dim. of sphæra, a ball, sphere: see sphere.] A little sphere or spherical body. Quicksilver, when poured upon a plane surface, divides itself into a great number of minute spherules.

spherulite (sfer′ō-līt), n. [Also sphærulite; < spherule + -ite[2].] 1. A vitreous globule, such as those of which perlite is made up, having a more or less perfectly developed concentric and at the same time decidedly radiating fibrous structure. The highly silicious volcanic rocks not unfrequently have a spherulitic structure.—2. Same as radiolite, 2.—Spherulite rock, in geol., a rock of which the predominating part has a spherulitic structure.

spherulitic (sfer-ō-lit′ik), a. [< spherulite + -ic.] Made up of or containing spherulites; having the character of a spherulite. Also sphærulitic.

spherulitize (sfer′ō-li-tīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. spherulitized, ppr. spherulitizing. [< spherulite + -ize.] To convert more or less completely into spherulites, or cause to assume a spherulitic structure, wholly or in part. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV. 250.

spherulitoid (sfer′ō-li-toid), a. [< spherulite + -oid.] Having more or less perfectly the form of a spherulite. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV. 248.

sphery (sfēr′i), a. [< sphere + -y[1].] 1. Belonging to the spheres.

> She can teach ye how to climb > Higher than the sphery chime.
> Milton, Comus, l. 1021.

2. Resembling a sphere or star in roundness, brightness, or other attribute.

> What wicked and dissembling glass of mine
> Made me compare with Hermia's sphery eyne?
> Shak., M. N. D., ii. 2. 99.

spheterize (sfet′e-rīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. spheterized, ppr. spheterizing. [< Gr. σφετερίζειν, make one's own, < σφέτερος, their own, poss. adj. of the 3d pers. pl., < σφείς, they.] To take to one's self; appropriate as one's own. Burke. [Rare.] (Encyc. Dict.)

Sphex (sfeks), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1758), < Gr. σφήξ, a wasp: see wasp.] 1. A notable genus of large handsome digger-wasps, typical of the family Sphegidæ (or Spheeidæ or Sphexidæ). They abound in tropical regions, but some 12 species inhabit the United States. S. ichneumonea digs rapidly in hard ground, and provisions its cells with grasshoppers. About 100 species are known. See cut under digger-wasp.

2. [l. c.] A wasp of this genus.

sphex-fly (sfeks′flī), n. One of numerous different dipterous insects, as of the genus Conops, which resemble a sphex in some respects.

sphiggure (sfig′ūr), n. See sphingure.

sphincter (sfingk′tėr), n. [NL., < L. sphincter, < Gr. σφιγκτήρ, anything which binds tight, a lace, a band, < σφίγγειν, shut tight, close.] An orbicular, circular, or annular muscle surrounding and capable of closing a natural orifice or passage of the body.—Oral sphincter. Same as orbicularis oris (which see, under orbicularis).—Sphincter ani, the sphincter of the anus, under which name two distinct muscles are known. (a) The sphincter ani proper, sphincter externus, or external sphincter is a thin, flat plane of voluntary muscular fibers supplied by hemorrhoidal branches of nerves from the sacral plexus, surrounding the anus, subcutaneous and intimately adherent to the integument, of elliptical form 3 or 4 inches in long diameter, and an inch wide across. It arises from the tip of the coccyx, and is inserted into the tendinous raphe of the perineum. Like most sphincters, it consists of symmetrical lateral halves united by a raphe in front of and behind the opening it incloses. (b) The sphincter recti, sphincter internus, or internal sphincter surrounds the lower end of the rectum, forming a muscular ring about an inch in extent and a quarter of an inch thick, and consists of an aggregation and thickening of the circular fibers of the gut. This sphincter is involuntary, and in health maintains its tonic contractility, which yields by reflex action to the pressure of the contents of the bowel.—Sphincter oculi, or sphincter palpebrarum, the orbicular muscle of the eyelids, which surrounds and closes them. Usually called orbicularis palpebrarum. See cut under muscle[1].—Sphincter oris, the oral sphincter. See orbicularis oris, under orbicularis.—Sphincter pupillaris, the circular or concentric fibers of the iris, whose contraction makes the pupil smaller. Also called sphincter pupillæ and sphincter iridis.—Sphincter pylori. See pylorus.—Sphincter recti, the internal sphincter ani (see above).—Sphincter vaginæ, an elliptical muscle surrounding the orifice of the vagina, corresponding to the bulbocavernosus of the male. Also called constrictor vaginæ.—Sphincter vesicæ, the unstriped involuntary muscular fibers around the neck of the urinary bladder.—Sphincter vesicæ externus, the partly plain partly striated muscular fibers which surround the prostatic part of the urethra. Also called sphincter prostaticus and sphincter of Henle.

sphincteral (sfingk′tėr-al), a. [< sphincter + -al.] Same as sphincterial.

sphincterate (sfingk′tėr-āt), a. [Also sphincterate: < sphincter + -ate[1].] 1. In anat. and zoöl., provided with a sphincter; closed or closable by means of a sphincter.—2. Contracted or constricted as if by a sphincter: thus, an hourglass is sphincterate in the middle.

sphincterial (sfingk-tē′ri-al), a. [< sphincter + -ial.] Of or pertaining to a sphincter or its function: as, a sphincterial muscle; sphincterial fibers; sphincterial action.

sphincteric (sfingk-ter′ik), a. [< sphincter + -ic.] Same as sphincterial.

sphincterotomy (sfingk-tė-rot′ō-mi), n. [< Gr. σφιγκτήρ, a sphincter, + -τομία, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] The operation of cutting a sphincter to prevent its spasmodic action.

sphinctrate (sfingk′trāt), a. Same as sphincterate.

Sphindidæ (sfin′di-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphindus + -idæ.] An aberrant family of serricorn beetles, in which the antennæ are so obviously clavate as to resemble those of the clavicorn series. It contains a few small species found in fungi which grow upon the trunks of trees.

Sphindus (sfin'dus), n. [NL. (Chevrolat, 1833), a made word.] The typical genus of the Sphindidæ. Only 3 species are known, one of which is North American.

Sphingidæ (sfin'ji-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Leach, 1819), < Sphinx (Sphing-) + -idæ.] An important family of heterocerous lepidopterous insects, with fusiform antennæ, typified by the genus Sphinx, including all those commonly known as sphinxes, sphinx-moths, hawk-moths, or humming-bird moths. The body is robust; the abdomen is stout, conical, often tufted; the tongue is usually long and strong; the antennæ have a hook at the tip; the wings are comparatively small and narrow, the fore wings acute at the tip. They are diurnal or crepuscular in habit, a few flying in the hottest sunshine, but the majority in the twilight. The larvæ are large, naked, usually green in color, and generally furnished with a prominent caudal horn, which is sometimes replaced after the last molt by a shining lenticular tubercle. When full-grown they either pupate above ground, between leaves, in a slight cocoon, or more generally go deep under ground, and transform in an earthen cell. The long-tongued species have a special free and characteristic tongue-case. The species of temperate regions are divided into four principal subfamilies: Macroglossinæ, Chærocampinæ, Sphinginæ, and Smerinthinæ. From America north of Mexico 83 species have been described, about 50 from Europe, and rather more than 600 for the entire world. Also Sphingides, Sphingidi, Sphingina, Sphingoidea, and Sphingoides. See cuts under hog-caterpillar, Philampelus, hawk-moth, Lepidoptera, and sphinx.

sphingiform (sfin'ji-fôrm), a. [< NL. Sphinx (Sphing-) + L. forma, form.] In entom., resembling a moth of the family Sphingidæ.

sphingine (sfin'jin), a. Resembling a sphinx or hawk-moth; of or pertaining to the Sphingidæ; sphingoid or sphingiform.

sphingoid (sfing'goid), a. [< NL. Sphinx (Sphing-) + -oid.] Like a sphinx or hawk-moth; sphingine or sphingiform.

sphingure (sfing'gūr), n. [= F. sphiggure: see Sphingurus.] A member of the genus Sphingurus.

Sphingurinæ (sfing-gū-rī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphingurus + -inæ.] The American porcupines; a subfamily of Hystricidæ, of more or less completely arboreal habits, represented by four genera, Sphingurus, Synetheres, Chætomys, and Erethizon: so named by E. R. Alston in 1876. It corresponds to the Synetherina of Gervais (1852), the Synetherinæ of J. A. Allen (1877), and the Cercolabinæ (as a subfamily of Spalacopodidæ) of Lilljeborg (1866) and Gill (1872). See cuts under porcupine and prehensile.

sphingurine (sfing'gū-rin), a. Of or belonging to the Sphingurinæ; synetherine; cercolabine.

Sphingurus (sfing-gū'rus), n. [NL. (F. Cuvier, 1822, in form Sphiggurus), < Gr. σφίγγειν, throttle, strangle (see sphinx), + οὐρά, tail.] The typical genus of Sphingurinæ, having the tail prehensile, all four feet four-toed, and little development of spines. It is closely related to Synetheres; but the latter is more spiny, and has a broad, highly arched frontal region. The two genera are united by Brandt under the name Cercolabes. Each has several Neotropical species in Central and South America, east of the Andes, from southeastern Mexico and the West Indies to Paraguay.

sphinx (sfingks), n.; pl. sphinxes, sphinges (sfingk'sez, sfin'jēz). [= F. sphinx = Sp. esfinge = Pg. esphinge = It. sfinge = G. sphinx, < L. sphinx, < Gr. σφίγξ (σφιγγ-), Æolic φίξ, a sphinx (Theban or Egyptian: see defs. 1 and 2); supposed to mean lit. 'strangler,' the story being that the Sphinx strangled those who could not solve her riddles; < σφίγγειν, throttle, strangle, orig. bind, compress, fix; prob. = L. figere, fix (see fix); by some connected with L. fascis, a bundle: see fascis.]

1. [cap. or l. c.] In Gr. myth., a female monster, said to have proposed a riddle to the Thebans who passed her as she sat on a rock by the roadside, and to have killed all who were not able to guess it. The riddle, according to tradition, inquired what being has successively four, two, and three feet, and is weakest when it has most feet. (Œdipus answered, Man, who creeps in infancy, afterward goes erect, and finally walks with a staff (a third foot). The Sphinx, in compliance with her own conditions, thereupon threw herself from her rock and died. In art this monster is represented with the body of a lion or a dog, winged, and the head and often the breasts of a woman.

> For valour, is not Love a Hercules? . . .
> Subtle as Sphinx. Shak., L. L. L., iv. 3. 342.

> In the third [court] . . . are two Sphinges very curiously carved in brasse. Coryat, Crudities, I. 35.

2. In Egypt. antiq., a figure somewhat similar in composition to the Greek, having the body of a lion (never winged), and a male human head or an animal head. The human-headed figures have been called androsphinxes; those with the head of a ram, criosphinxes; and those with the head of a hawk, hieracosphinxes. Egyptian sphinxes are symbolical figures, having no connection with the Greek fable; and the Greeks probably applied the term sphinx to the Egyptian statues merely on account of the accidental external resemblance between them and their own conception. The Egyptian sphinxes were commonly placed in avenues leading to temples or tombs. The most celebrated example is the Great Sphinx near the great pyramids of Ghizeh, hewn out of solid granite, with the recumbent body of a lion, 146 feet long from the shoulders to the rump, and 56 feet high, and a man's head 28½ feet high from chin to crown. A small temple stood between the fore paws of this sphinx. There are also Oriental sphinxes, in general akin to the Egyptian, but more often winged than wingless. See cut under androsphinx.

3. In her., a creature with a lion's body and a woman's head, but not necessarily like any ancient original. It is assumed to be winged; when not winged, it should be blazoned "sans wings."—4. An enigmatic or sphinx-like person; one who talks puzzlingly, or is inscrutable in disposition or character; one whom it is hard to understand.—5. In entom.: (a) A hawk-moth; a member of the genus Sphinx or the family Sphingidæ. See cuts under hawk-moth, hog-caterpillar, Lepidoptera, and Philampelus. (b) [cap.] [NL. (Linnæus, 1767).] The typical genus of the family Sphingidæ. At first it was coextensive with this family; later it formed a group of variable extent; now it is confined to forms having the head small, the eyes lashed, tibiæ spinose, and fore tarsi usually armed with long spines. It is a wide-spread genus; 19 species occur in America north of Mexico. The larvæ of this, as well as of other groups of the family Sphingidæ, have the habit of erecting the head and anterior segments, from which Linnæus derived a fanciful resemblance to the Egyptian Sphinx (whence the name).

6. The Guinea baboon, Cynocephalus papio or Papio sphinx. Also called sphinx-baboon.—Abbot's sphinx, Thyreus abboti, a small North American sphinx whose larva feeds on the vine.—Achemon sphinx, Philampelus achemon. See cuts of moth and larva under Philampelus.—Blind-eyed sphinx, Paonias excæcatus, a handsome American moth, of a general fawn color, with roseate hind wings ornamented with a blue-centered eye-spot, whose larva lives upon the apple.—Carolina sphinx, Protoparce carolina, a mottled gray and black moth whose larva is the tobacco-worm. See cut under tobacco-worm.—Catalpa sphinx, Ceratomia catalpæ, an American moth whose larva feeds on the catalpa.—Clear-winged sphinx, a moth whose wings are partly hyaline, as Hemaris diffinis and other members of the same genus; also, improperly, certain of the Sesiidæ. See cut under raspberry-borer.—Death's-head sphinx, Acherontia atropos. See cut under death's-head.—Five-spotted sphinx, Protoparce celeus, a common gray North American moth whose abdomen is marked with five orange spots on each side, and whose larva feeds upon the tomato, potato, and other solanaceous plants. See cut under tomato-worm.—Morning-sphinx, any species of the genus Deilephila, as D. lineata, the white-lined morning-sphinx, a common American moth of striking coloration, whose larva feeds on purslane.—Satellite sphinx. See satellite-sphinx (with cut).—Walnut-sphinx, Cressonia juglandis, an American moth whose larva feeds on the walnut.—sphinx-moth (sfingks'môth), n. Same as sphinx, 5 (a).

sphragide (sfraj'id), n. [< F. sphragide, < L. sphragis, < Gr. σφραγίς, a signet, a seal.] Same as Lemnian earth (which see, under Lemnian).

sphragistics (sfrā-jis'tiks), n. [< Gr. σφραγιστικός, of, for, or pertaining to sealing, < σφραγίζειν, seal, < σφραγίς, a seal.] The study of seals and the distinctions among them; the archæology of seals. This study is similar in its nature to numismatics, and has been of great use in the history of the middle ages, as well as in the investigation of costume, armor, etc.; it is also of value in connection with the documents to which seals are attached, as aiding in their classification and in the proof of their authenticity.

sphrigosis (sfri-gō'sis), n. [NL., for sphrigesis*; < Gr. σφριγᾶν, be full and vigorous, + -osis.] Over-rankness in fruit-trees and other plants. It is a disease in which the plant tends to grow to wood or stems and leaves in place of fruit or bulb, etc., or to grow so luxuriantly that the nutritious qualities of the product are injured, as in the turnip and potato. Sphrigosis is sometimes due to over-manuring, sometimes to constitutional defect. Compare rankness, 4.

sphygmic (sfig'mik), a. [< Gr. σφυγμικός, pertaining to the pulse, < σφυγμός, the beating of the heart, the pulse: see sphygmus.] 1. Of or pertaining to the pulse.—2. In zoöl., pulsating or pulsatile; beating with rhythmic contraction and dilatation, like a pulse; specifically, belonging to the Sphygmica.

Sphygmica (sfig'mi-kạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σφυγμικός, pertaining to the pulse: see sphygmic.] A group or series of amœbiform protozoans, in which regularly contractile or sphygmic vacuoles are observed. See Amœboidea.

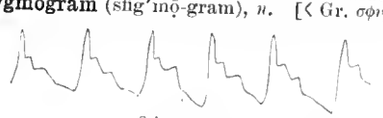
sphygmogram (sfig'mō-gram), n. [< Gr. σφυγμός, pulse, + γράμμα, a writing.] A tracing of the changes of tension at a point in an artery, as obtained with a sphygmograph.



Sphygmogram.

sphygmograph (sfig'mō-gráf), n. [< Gr. σφυγμός, pulse, + γράφειν, write.] An instrument which, when applied over an artery, traces on Sphygmograph.

a, band by which the instrument is fastened on; b, spring which rests upon the artery; c, adjusting-screw (with graduated head) which regulates the pressure of the spring b according as the pulse is strong or weak; d, d, supports for paper upon which the tracing is made; e, feed-roller, between which and the pressure-wheels c, c the paper is carried; f, spring which bears on the shaft of the wheels e, e to engage the paper positively; g, small spring clockwork (incased) by which motion is imparted to the feed-roller e; h, milled-headed winding-key; i, stop-motion; j, tracer attached to the oscillating arm k, which is moved by the rod l that connects this arm with the spring b.

Abbot's Sphinx (Thyreus abboti), moth and larva, natural size.

a piece of paper moved by clockwork a curve which indicates the changes of tension of the blood within. The paper is blackened by holding it over a smoking lamp, and the tracer, moving in accordance with the pulsations of the artery, indicates the rapidity, strength, and uniformity of the beats. The tracings are preserved by a thin varnish of gum damar dissolved in benzolin.

sphygmographic (sfig-mō-graf'ik), a. [< sphygmograph + -ic.] Of or pertaining to, or registered or traced by, the sphygmograph.

sphygmography (sfig-mog'ra-fi), n. [As sphygmograph + -y[3].] 1. The act or art of taking pulse-tracings or sphygmograms.—2. A description of the pulse.

sphygmoid (sfig'moid), a. [< Gr. σφυγμός, pulse, + εἶδος, form.] Pulse-like.

sphygmology (sfig-mol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. σφυγμός, pulse, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The sum of scientific knowledge concerning the pulse.

sphygmomanometer (sfig″mō-mā-nom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. σφυγμός, pulse, + μανός, rare, + μέτρον, measure (cf. manometer).] An instrument for measuring the tension of the blood in an artery.

sphygmometer (sfig-mom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. σφυγμός, pulse, + μέτρον, measure.] Same as sphygmomanometer.

sphygmophone (sfig'mō-fōn), n. [< Gr. σφυγμός, pulse, + φωνή, sound, voice.] An instrument by the aid of which each pulse-beat makes a sound. It is a combination of a kind of sphygmograph with a microphone.

sphygmoscope (sfig'mō-skōp), n. [< Gr. σφυγμός, pulse, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument for rendering the arterial pulsations visible. One form of it works by the projection of a ray of light from a mirror which is moved by the pulsation; in another form the impact of the pulsation is received in a reservoir of liquid, which is caused by it to mount in a graduated tube. The invention of the instrument is ascribed to Galileo.

sphygmus (sfig'mus), n. [NL., < Gr. σφυγμός, the beating of the heart, the pulse, < σφίζειν, beat violently, throb.] The pulse.

sphynx, n. An occasional misspelling of sphinx.

Sphyræna (sfī-rē'nä), n. [NL. (Artedi, Bloch, etc.), < L. sphyræna, < Gr. σφύραινα, a sea-fish so called, a hammer-fish, < σφῦρα, hammer, mallet.] 1. The representative genus of Sphyræniдæ. It contains about 20 species of voracious pike-like fishes, of most temperate and tropical seas. S. spet or S. vulgaris is the becuna, of both coasts of the Atlantic and of the Mediterranean, the sphyræna of the ancients, about 2 feet long, of an olive color, silvery below, when young with dusky blotches. S. argentea of the Pacific coast, abundant from San Francisco southward, about 3 feet long, is an important food-fish. S. picuda, the barracuda of the West Indies, grows to be sometimes 7 or 8 or even, it is claimed, 10 feet long. See cut under becuna. 2. [l. c.] A fish of this genus.

Sphyrænidæ (sfī-ren'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1831), < Sphyræna + -idæ.] A family of percesocine acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Sphyræna. About 20 species are known, all of which are closely related, and usually referred to the single genus Sphyræna. They are mostly inhabitants of the tropical seas; but a few advance northward and southward into cooler waters, as along the United States coast to New England. They are voracious and savage, and the larger ones are much dreaded. See cut under becuna. Also Sphyrænoidei.

sphyrænine (sfī-rē'nin), a. [< Sphyræna + -ine[1].] Same as sphyrænoid.

sphyrænoid (sfī-rē'noid), a. [< Sphyræna + -oid.] Of or pertaining to the Sphyrænidæ.

Sphyrna (sfėr'nä), n. [NL. (Rafinesque, 1815), an error for Sphyra*, < Gr. σῦρα, a hammer.] A genus of hammer-headed sharks, giving name to the family Sphyrnidæ. It contains those in which the head is most hammer-like, and grooves extend from the nostrils to the front. S. tiburo, the bonnet-shark, is now placed in another genus (Reniceps). Zygæna is an exact synonym of Sphyrna, but is preoccupied in entomology. Also called Cestracion (after Klein). See cut under hammerhead.

Sphyrnidæ (sfėr'ni-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphyrna + -idæ.] A family of anarthrous selachians; the hammer-headed sharks, having an extraordinary conformation of the head. There are 3 genera and 5 or 6 species, found in most seas. The body usually has the common shark-like form; but the head is expanded laterally into a kidney-like shape, or arched like a hammer-head. The eyes are upon the sides of the expanded head, and the nostrils are on the front edge. The fins are like those of ordinary sharks. See cuts under hammerhead and shark. Also called Zygænidæ.

sphyrnine (sfėr'nin), a. [< Sphyrna + -ine[1].] Of the character or appearance of a hammer-headed shark; belonging to the Sphyrnidæ; zygænine.

Sphyropicus (sfī-rō-pī'kus), n. [NL. (orig. Sphyrapicus, S. F. Baird, 1858), < Gr. σφῦρα, a hammer, + L. picus, a woodpecker.] A remarkable genus of Picidæ, having the tongue obtuse, brushy, and scarcely extensile, owing to the shortness of the hyoid bones, whose horns do not curl up over the hindhead; the sapsuckers, or sapsucking woodpeckers. There are several species, all American, feeding upon soft fruits and sapwood, as well as upon insects. The common yellow-bellied woodpecker of the United States is S. varius, of which a variety, S. nuchalis, is found in the west, and another, S. ruber, has the whole head, neck, and breast carmine-red. A very distinct species is S. thyroideus of the western United States, notable for the great difference between the sexes, which long caused them to be regarded as different species, and even placed in different genera. The condition of the hyoid apparatus in this genus is unique, though an approach to it is seen in the genus Xenopicus. See cut under sapsucker.

spial† (spī'al), n. [Early mod. E. also spyal, spyall; by aphæresis from espial: see espial, and cf. spion, spy.] 1. Close or secret watch; espial.

> I have those eyes and ears shall still keep guard
> And spial on thee. B. Jonson, Catiline, iv. 2.

2. A spy; a watcher; a scout.

> Secretaries and spials of princes and states bring in bills for intelligence. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

spiauterite (spi-â'tėr-īt), n. [< G. spiauter, spelter (see spelter), + -ite[2].] Same as wurtzite.

spica (spī'kä), n. [< L. spica, a point, spike, ear of grain: see spike[1].] 1. In bot., a spike.—2. In surg., a spiral bandage with reversed turns: so named because it was thought to resemble a spike of barley.—3. In ornith., a spur; a calcar.—4. [cap.] In astron., a very white star of magnitude 1.2, the sixteenth in order of brightness in the heavens, a Virginis, situated on the left hand of the Virgin.—Spica celtica, an old name of Valeriana Celtica.—Spica nardi. Same as spikenard.

spical (spī'kal), a. [< NL. spicalis*, < L. spica, a spike: see spike[1].] Same as spicate: as, the spical palpi of a dipterous insect.

Spicatæ (spī-kā'tē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of L. spicatus, spiked: see spicate.] A section of pennatuloid polyps, distinguished by a bilateral arrangement of the polyps on the rachis, which is elongate, cylindrical, and destitute of pinnules.

spicate (spī'kāt), a. [< L. spicatus, spiked, pp. of spicare, furnish with spikes, < spica, a spike: see spike[1].] 1. In bot., having the form of a spike; arranged or disposed in spikes.—2. In ornith., spurred; calcarate; spiciferous.

spicated (spī'kā-ted), a. [< spicate + -ed[2].] In bot., same as spicate.

spicateous (spī-kā'tē-us), a. [Irreg. < spicate + -eous.] In zoöl., spicate; specifically, of or pertaining to the Spicatæ.

spicatum (spī-kā'tum), n. [L., sc. opus, lit. 'spicate work': see spicate.] In anc. masonry, herring-bone work: so called from the resemblance of the position of the blocks of any two contiguous courses to that of the grains in an ear of wheat.

> Piers Plowman (B), i. 147.

3†. An exemplification of the kind of thing mentioned; specimen; sample; instance; piece.

> Whanne he seeth the lepre in the skynne, and the heeris chaungid into whijt colour, and thilk spice of lepre lower than the skynne and that other fleah, a plaage of lepre it is. Wyclif, Lev. xiii. 3.

He hath spices of them all, not all. Shak., Cor., iv. 7. 46.

4. A characteristic touch or taste; a modicum, smack, or flavoring, as of something piquant or exciting to the mind: as, a spice of roguery or of adventure. [In this sense now regarded as a figurative use of def. 5; compare sauce in a similar figurative use.]

> I think I may pronounce of them, as I heard good Senecio, with a spice of the wit of the last age, say, viz., "That a merry fellow is the saddest fellow in the world."
> Steele, Tatler, No. 45.
>
> The world loves a spice of wickedness.
> Longfellow, Hyperion, i. 7.

5. A substance aromatic or pungent to the taste, or to both taste and smell; a drug; a savory or piquant condiment or eatable; a relish. The word in this sense formerly had a much wider range than at present (def. 6); it is still used in northern England as including sweetmeats, gingerbread, cake, and any kind of dried fruit.

> "Hastow auȝte in thi purs, any hote spices?"
> "I haue peper and piones [peony-seeds]," quod she, "and a pounde of garlike, > A ferthyngworth of fenel-seed for fastyngdayes."
> Piers Plowman (B), v. 311.

Now, specifically—6. One of a class of aromatic vegetable condiments used for the seasoning of food, commonly in a pulverized state, as pepper, allspice, nutmeg, ginger, cinnamon, and cloves; collectively, such substances as a class: as, the trade in spices or spice.

> So was her love diffused; but, like to some odorous spices, > Suffered no waste nor loss, though filling the air with aroma. Longfellow, Evangeline, ii. 5.

7. A piquant odor or odorous substance, especially of vegetable origin; a spicy smell. [Poetical.]

> The woodbine spices are wafted abroad,
> And the musk of the rose is blown.
> Tennyson, Maud, xxii.

8. Figuratively, a piquant concomitant; an engaging accompaniment or incident; an attractive or enjoyable variation.

> Is not birth, . . . youth, liberality, and such like, the spice and salt that season a man?
> Shak., T. and C., i. 2. 277.

For frutes a-fore mete to ete them fastyngely.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 162.

He had in the hall-kitchen . . . a clerk of his spicery.
G. Cavendish, Cardinal Wolsey, I. 34.

4. A spicy quality or effect; an aromatic effluence; spiciness.

My taste by her sweet lips drawn with delight,
My smelling won with her breath's spicery.
Drayton, Idea, xxix., To the Senses.

The affluence of his [Emerson's] illustrations diffuses a flavor of oriental spicery over his pages.
G. Ripley, in Frothingham, p. 266.

spice-shop (spīs'shop), n. [< ME. spice schope; < spice + shop.] A shop for the sale of aromatic substances; formerly, a grocery or an apothecary's shop.

A Spycere schoppe (a Spice schope . . .), apotheca vel ipotheca.
Cath. Ang., p. 355.

spice-tree (spīs'trē), n. An evergreen tree, Umbellularia Californica, of the Pacific United States, variously known as mountain-laurel, California laurel, olive, or bay-tree, and cajeput. Northward it grows from 70 to 90 feet high, and affords a hard strong wood susceptible of a beautiful polish; this is used for some ship building purposes, and is the finest cabinet-wood of its region. The leaves are exceedingly acrid, exhaling, when bruised, a pungent effluvium which excites sneezing.

spicewood (spīs'wůd), n. Same as spice-bush.

spiciferous (spī-sif'ę-rus), a. [< L. spicifer, ear-bearing, < spica, a spike, ear, + ferre = E. bear[1].] 1. In bot., bearing or producing spikes; spicate; eared. — 2. In ornith., spurred; having spurs or calcars, as a fowl.

spiciform (spī'si-fôrm), a. [< L. spica, a point, spike, ear, + forma, form.] Having the form of a spica or spike.

spicily (spī'si-li), adv. In a spicy manner; pungently; with a spicy flavor.

spiciness (spī'si-nes), n. The quality of being racy, piquant, or spicy, in any sense.

Delighted with the spiciness of this beautiful young woman.
The Century, XXVI. 870.

spick[1]†, n. [An obs. or dial. form of spike[1]; cf. pick[1] as related to pike[1].] A spike; a tenter.
Florio.

spick[2] (spik), n. [Origin obscure.] A titmouse. —Blue spick, the blue titmouse, Parus cæruleus.

spick[3] (spik), n. See spick-and-span-new.

spick-and-span (spik'and-span'), a. [Shortened from spick-and-span-new.] Same as spick-and-span-new.

From our poetic store-house we produce
A couple [of similes] spick and span, for present use.
Garrick, quoted in W. Cooke's Memoirs of S. Foote, I. 107.

The Dutch Beer will not endure over him . . . a spick-and-span Dutch Africander from the Cape Colony.
Trollope, South Africa, II. vi.

Beside my hotel rose a big spick-and-span church.
H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 178.

spick-and-span-new (spik'and-span'nū'), a. [Also spick-span-new; lit. 'new as a spike and chip': an emphatic form of span-new: see spike[1], spoon[1], new, and cf. span-new, spick-span-new. Cf. also the equiv. D. spik-splinter-nieuw, 'spick-splinter-new,' Dan. splinter-ny, Sw. splitter-ny, 'splinter-new,' Sw. dial. till splint och span ny, 'splint-and-span-new,' G. spalt-neu, 'splinter-new,' etc., E. brand-new, etc. A compound of four independent elements, like this, is very rare in E.; the lit. meaning of the nouns spick and span is not now recognized, but the words spick and span are taken together adverbially, qualifying new, with which they form a compound. By omission of new, the phrase spick-and-span is sometimes used with an attributive force.] New and fresh; span-new; brand-new.

'Tis a fashion of the newest edition, spick and span new, without example.
Ford, Lover's Melancholy, ii. 1.

Among other Things, Black-Friars will entertain you with a Play spick and span new, and the Cockpit with another.
Howell, Letters, I. iv. 2.

spicket† (spik'et), n. An obsolete form of spigot.

spicknel, spignel (spik'nel, spig'nel), n. [Early mod. E. also spicknell, spignell, speknel, spikenel; said to be a corruption of spike-nail, and to be so called in allusion to the shape of its long capillary leaves.] The baldmoney, Meum athamanticum; also, any plant of the related genus Athamanta, which has similar graceful finely dissected foliage.

spick-span-new (spik'span-nū'), a. Same as spick-and-span-new.

Look at the cloäths on 'er back, thebbe ammost spick-span-new.
Tennyson, Northern Cobbler.

spicose (spī'kōs), a. [< NL. spicosus: see spicous.] In bot., same as spicous.

spicosity (spī-kos'i-ti), n. [< spicose + -ity.] In bot., the state or condition of being spicous or eared.

spicous (spī'kus), a. [Also spicose; < NL. spicosus, < L. spica, a spike, ear: see spike[1].] In bot., having spikes or ears; spiked or eared like corn.

spicula[1] (spik'ū-lă), n.; pl. spiculæ (-lē). [NL.: see spicule.] 1. In bot., a diminutive or secondary spike; a spikelet. — 2. A small splinter-like body; a spicule. — 3. In zoöl., a spicule or spiculum. [Rare.]

spicula[2], n. Plural of spiculum.

spicular (spik'ū-lăr), a. [< spicule + -ar[3].] In zoöl.: (a) Having the form or character of a spicule; resembling a spicule; dart-like; spiculiform; spiculate. (b) Containing or composed of spicules; spiculous; spiculiferous or spiculigenous: as, a spicular integument; the spicular skeleton of a sponge or radiolarian. — Spicular notation, a notation for logic, invented by Augustus De Morgan (though the name was given by Sir William Hamilton), in which great use is made of marks of parenthesis. The significations of the principal signs are as follows:

X))Y All Xs are Ys.
X).(Y No Xs are Ys.
X(.)Y Everything is either X or Y.
X((Y Some Xs compose all the Ys.
X(.(Y Some Xs are not Ys.
X()Y Some Xs are Ys.
X)(Y Some things are neither X nor Y.
X).)Y None of the Xs are certain of the Ys.

spiculate (spik'ū-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. spiculated, ppr. spiculating. [< L. spiculatus, pp. of spiculare, sharpen, < spiculum, dim. of spicum, a point: see spike[1].] To sharpen to a point.

Extend a rail of elm, securely arm'd
With spiculated paling.
W. Mason, English Garden, ii.

spiculate (spik'ū-lāt), a. [< L. spiculatus, pp.: see the verb.] 1. In zoöl., sharp-pointed; spicate. — 2. Covered with or divided into fine points. Specifically, in bot.: (a) Covered with pointed fleshy appendages, as a surface. (b) Noting a spike composed of several spikelets crowded together.

spicule (spik'ūl), n. [< L. spiculum, NL. also spicula, f., a little sharp point, dim. of spicum, spica, a point, spike: see spike[1].] 1. A fine-pointed body resembling a needle: as, ice-spicules. — 2. In bot.: (a) A spikelet. (b) One of the small projections or points on the basidia of hymenomycetous fungi which bear the spores. There are usually four to each basidium. See sterigma. — 3. In zoöl., a hard, sharp body like a little spike, straight or curved, rod-like, or branched, or diversiform; a spiculum; a sclere: variously applied, without special reference to size or shape. Specifically — (a) One of the skeletal elements, scleres, or spicula of the pretozoans, as radiolarians, either Sphærozoum punctatum.

A, natural size; B, two of the sacs with colored vesicles and spicules which lie in the investing protoplasm, magnified.

calcareous or silicious, coherent or detached. See cuts under Radiolaria and Sphærozoum. (b) One of the spines of echinoderms, sometimes of great size, and bristling over the surface of the test, as in sea-urchins or small, and embedded in the integument, as in holothurians; sometimes of singular shape, like wheels, anchors, etc. See cuts under ancora[1], Echinometra, Echinus, and Spatangus. (c) In sponges, a spiculum; one of the hard calcareous or silicious bodies, of whatever shape, which enter into the composition of the skeleton; a mineral sclere: a sponge-spicule (which see). Some sponges mostly consist of spicules, as that figured under Euplectella. (d) In some worms and mollusks, a dart-like organ constituting a kind of penis; a spiculum (which see). (e) In entom.: (1) A minute spine or spinous process. (2) The piercing ovipositor of any insect; especially, the lancet-like portion of the sting of a parasitic hymenopter. See Spiculifera.

spicule-sheath (spik'ūl-shēth), n. A thin layer of organic substance forming the sheath or investment of a sponge-spicule.

Spiculifera (spik-ū-lif'ę-rą), n. pl. [NL.: see spiculiferous.] In Westwood's classification of insects, a division of Hymenoptera, in which the abdomen is, in the female, armed with a long plurivalve ovipositor, and the larvæ are footless. It contains the ichneumons (including braconids), the evaniids, the proctetrypids, the chalcids, and the cynipids or gall-flies. It thus corresponds to the Pupivora of Latreille, except in excluding the Chrysididæ as Tubulifera.

spiculiferous (spik-ū-lif'ę-rus), a. [< L. spiculum, a spicule, + ferre = E. bear[1].] In zoöl., having a spiculum or spicula; spicular or spiculous; specifically, in entom., having a piercing ovipositor; of or pertaining to the Spiculifera. Also spiculigerous.

spiculiform (spik'ū-li-fôrm), a. [< L. spiculum, a spicule, + forma, form.] In bot. and zoöl., having the form of a spicule; being of the nature of a spicule.

spiculigenous (spik-ū-lij'e-nus), a. [< L. spiculum, a spicule, + -genus, producing: see -genous.] Producing spicules; giving origin to spicules; spiculiferous: as, the spiculigenous tissue of a sponge.

spiculigerous (spik-ū-lij'ę-rus), a. [< L spiculum, a spicule, + gerere, carry.] Same as spiculiferous.

spiculose (spik'ū-lōs), a. [< NL. spiculosus: see spiculous.] Same as spiculous.

spiculous (spik'ū-lus), a. [Also spiculose; < NL. spiculosus, < L. spiculum, a spicule: see spicule.] Having spicules; spinulose; spiculose or spiculiferous.

spiculum (spik'ū-lum), n.; pl. spicula (-lą). [NL., < L. spiculum, a little sharp point: see spicule.] In zoöl., a spicula or spicule. Specifically — (a) In some worms, a chitinous rod developed in the cloaca as a copulatory organ; a kind of penis. (b) In some mollusks, as snails, the love-dart, a kind of penis, more fully called spiculum amoris. (c) In insects, the piercing non-poisoneus ovipositor of the Spiculifera.

spicy (spī'si), a. [< spice[1] + -y[1].] 1. Producing spice; abounding with spices.

As . . . off at sea north-east winds blow
Sabæan odours from the spicy shore
Of Araby the blest'd.
Milton, P. L., iv. 162.

2. Having the qualities of spice; flavored with spice; fragrant; aromatic: as, spicy plants.

The spicy nut-brown ale. Milton, L'Allegro, l. 100.

Under southern skies exalt their sails,
Led by new stars, and borne by spicy gales!
Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 392.

3. Highly flavored; pungent; keen; pointed; racy: as, a spicy letter or debate. [Colloq.]

Your hint about letter-writing for the papers is not a bad one. . . . A political surmise, a spicy bit of scandal, a sensation trial, wound up with a few moral reflections upon how much better we do the same sort of thing at home. Lever, A Rent in a Cloud, p. 58.

4. Stylish; showy; smart in appearance: as, a spicy garment; to look spicy. [Slang.]

"Bless'd if there isn't Snipe dismounting at the gate!" he exclaimed joyfully; "there's a drummer holding his nag. What a spicy chestnut it is!"
Whyte Melville, White Rose, I. xlii.

=Syn. 3. Racy, Spicy. See racy.

spider (spī′dėr), n. [An altered form of spither*, < ME. spither, dat. spithre, < AS. spīther*, orig. spinther*, with formative -ther of the agent, < spinnan, spin: see spin. Cf. spinner[1], a spider; D. spin = OHG. spinnā, MHG. G. spinne, a spider, lit. 'spinner.' For other E. names, see attercop, cop[2], tob[1], lop[3].] 1. An arthropod of the order Araneæ, Araneina, or Araneida (the old Linnean genus Aranea), of the class Arachnida, of which there are many families, hundreds of genera, and thousands of species, found all over the world. Though popularly considered insects, spiders are not true Insecta, since they have eight instead of only six legs, normally seven-jointed, and no wings are developed. They are dimerosomatous — that is, have the body divided into two principal regions, the cephalothorax, or head and chest together, and the abdomen, which is generally tumid or globose, whence the name Sphærogastra. No antennæ are developed as such, but there are raptorial organs called falces, which are subchelate — that is, have a distal joint folding down on the next like the blade of a pocket-knife. (See cut under falx.) In those species which are poisonous the falces are traversed by the duct of a venom-gland. Some spiders are by far the most venomous animals in existence in proportion to their size: that the bite of a spider can be fatal to man (and there are authentic instances of this) implies a venom vastly more powerful than that of the most poisonous snakes. (See katipo and Latrodectus.) Spiders breathe by means of pulmonary sacs, or lung-sacs, nearly always in connection with tracheæ or spiracles, whence they are called pulmotracheal; these sacs are two or four in number, whence a division of spiders into dipneumonous and tetrapneumonous aranеids. (See Dipneumones, 2, Tetrapneumones.) Most spiders belong to the former division. They have usually eight eyes, sometimes six, rarely four, in one genus (Nops) only two. The abdomen is always distinct, ordinarily globose, never segmented, and provided with two or more pairs of spinnerets. (See cut under arachnidium.) The characteristic habit of spiders is to spin webs to catch their prey, or to make a nest for themselves, or for both these purposes. Cobweb is a fine silky substance secreted by the arachnidium, or arachnidial glands, and conducted by ducts to the several, usually six, arachnidial mammillæ, which open on papillæ at or near the end of the abdomen, and through which the viscid material is spun out in fine gossamer threads. Gossamer or spider-silk serves not only to construct the webs, but also to let the spider drop speedily from one place to another, to throw a "flying bridge" across an interval, or even to enable some species to "fly" — that is, be buoyed up in the air and wafted a great distance. It has occasionally been woven artificially into a textile fabric, and is a well-known domestic application for stanching blood. (See cut under silk-spider.) Some spiders are sedentary, others vagabond; the former are called orbitelarian, retitelarian, tubitelarian, etc., according to the character of their webs. Spiders move by running in various directions, or by leaping; whence the vagabond species have been described as rectigrade, laterigrade, citigrade, saltigrade, etc. They lay numerous eggs, usually inclosed in a case or cocoon. The male is commonly much smaller than the female, and in impregnating the female runs great risk of being devoured. The difference in size is as if the human female should be some 60 or 70 feet tall. (See cut under silk-spider.) Spiders are carnivorous and highly predatory. Some of the largest kinds are able to kill small birds, whence the name bird-spiders of some of the great hairy mygalids. (See cut under bird-spider.) A few are aquatic, as the water-spiders of the genus Argyroneta (which see, with cut). Wolf-spiders or tarantulas belong to the family Lycosidæ; but the name tarantula is more frequently applied to the Mygalidæ (or Theraphosidæ). The common garden-spider or diadem-spider of Europe is Epeira diademata; that of the United States is E. cophinaria (or riparia). See Araneida, and cuts under chelicera, cross-spider, pulmonary, and tarantula.

My brain, more busy than the labouring spider,
Weaves tedious snares to trap mine enemies.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 1. 339.

2. Some other arachnidan, resembling or mistaken for a spider; a spider-mite. See red-spider.—3. A spider-crab; a sea-spider.—4. A cooking-utensil having legs or feet to keep it from contact with the coals: named from a fancied resemblance to the insect—the ordinary frying-pan is, however, sometimes erroneously termed a spider. (a) A kind of deep frying-pan, commonly with three feet.

Some people like the sound of bubbling in a boiling pot, or the fizzing of a frying-spider.
C. D. Warner, Backlog Studies, p. 10.

Hash was warmed up in the spider.
J. T. Trowbridge, Coupon Bonds, p. 113.

(b) A trivet; a low tripod used to support a dish, or the like, in front of a fire.

5. In mach.: (a) A skeleton of radiating spokes, as a rag-wheel. (b) The internal frame or skeleton of a gear-wheel, for instance, on which a cogged rim may be bolted, shrunk, or cast. (c) The solid interior part of a piston, to which the packing is attached, and to whose axis the piston-rod is secured. E. H. Knight.—6. Naut., an iron outrigger to keep a block clear of the ship's side.—Geometrical spider. See geometric.—Grass-spider, one of many different spiders, as species of Agalena, which spin webs on the grass, such as may be seen spangled with dew in the morning in meadows.—Round-web spider, one of many orbitelarian spiders, as species of Epeira (see, also, cut under cross-spider).—Spider couching. See couching[1], 5.—Trap-door spider. See Cteniza, Mygalidæ, trap-door, and cut under Araneida. (See also bird-spider, crab-spider, diving-spider, garden-spider, house-spider, jumping-spider, sea-spider, silk-spider, water-spider, wolf-spider.)

spider-ant (spī′dėr-ant), n. A solitary ant of the family Mutillidæ: so called from the spider-like aspect of the females.

spider-band (spī′dėr-band), n. Naut., an iron hoop round a mast to which the lower ends of the futtock-shrouds are secured; also, a hoop round a mast provided with belaying-pins. See cut under futtock-shrouds.

spider-bug (spī′dėr-bug), n. A long-legged heteropterous insect of the family Emesidæ, Emesa longipes, somewhat resembling a spider. See cut under stick-bug. [U. S.]

spider-catcher (spī′dėr-kach″ėr), n. A bird that catches spiders. Specifically—(a) The wall-creeper, Tichodroma muraria. See cut under Tichodroma. (b) pl. The genus Arachnothera in a broad sense, numerous species of which inhabit the Indo-Malayan region. They are small creeper-like birds with long bills, and belong to the family Nectariniidæ. Also called spider-eaters and spider-hunters.

Spider-catcher (Arachnothera magna).

spider-cells (spī′dėr-selz), n. pl. Neuroglia cells.

spider-cot (spī′dėr-kot), n. Same as spider-web.

spider-crab (spī′dėr-krab), n. A spider-like crab, or sea-spider, with long slender legs and comparatively small triangular body. The name is given to many such crabs, of different families, but especially to the maioids, or crabs of the family Maiidæ, such as Maia squinado, the common spinous spider-crab of Great Britain, and species of Libinia, Inachus, etc. The giant Japanese spider-crab, Macrochira kaempferi, is the largest crustacean. See cuts under Leptopodia, Lithodes, Maia, and Oxyrhyncha.

A Spider-crab (Inachus dorsettensis), male.

spider-diver (spī′dėr-dī″vėr), n. The little grebe, or dabchick. [Local, British.]

spider-eater (spī′dėr-ē″tėr), n. Same as spider-catcher (b).

I obtained an interesting bird, a green species of Spider-eater. H. O. Forbes, Eastern Archipelago, p. 233.

spidered (spī′dėrd), a. [< spider + -ed[2].] Infested with spiders; cobwebbed. [Rare.]

Content can visit the poor spidered room.
Wolcot (Peter Pindar), p. 39. (Davies.)

spider-flower (spī′dėr-flou″ėr), n. 1. A plant of the former genus Lasiandra of the Melastomaceæ, now included in Tibouchina. The species are elegant hothouse shrubs from Brazil, bearing large purple flowers.—2. A plant of the genus Cleome, especially C. spinosa (C. pungens), a native of tropical America, escaped from gardens in the southern United States. The stipules are spinous, the flowers large, rose-purple to white, with long stamens and style, suggesting the name. See cut under Cleome.

spider-fly (spī′dėr-flī), n. A parasitic pupiparous dipterous insect, as a bee-louse, bat-louse, bird-louse, bat-fly, sheep-tick, etc. They are of three families, Braulidæ, Nycteribiidæ, and Hippoboscidæ. Some of them, especially the wingless forms, as Nycteribia, closely resemble spiders in superficial appearance. See cut under sheep-tick.

spider-helmet (spī′dėr-hel″met), n. A name given to the skeleton head-pieces sometimes worn. See secret, n., 9.

spider-hunter (spī′dėr-hun″tėr), n. Same as spider-catcher (b).

spider-legs (spī′dėr-legz), n. pl. In gilding, irregular fractures sometimes occurring when gold-leaf is fitted over a molding having deep depressions.

spider-line (spī′dėr-līn), n. One of the threads of a spider's web substituted for wires in micrometer-scales intended for delicate astronomical observations.

The transit of the star is observed over spider lines stretched in the field, while a second observer reads the altitude of this star from the divided circle.
The Century, XXXVI. 608.

spider-mite (spī′dėr-mīt), n. A parasitic mite or acarid of the family Gamasidæ.

spider-monkey (spī′dėr-mung″ki), n. A tropical American platyrrhine monkey, of the family Cebidæ, subfamily Cebinæ, and genera Ateles and Brachyteles; a kind of sajou or sapajou, likened to a spider by reason of the very long and slim limbs, and long prehensile tail. They are large slender-bodied monkeys of great agility and of arboreal habits, with the thumb absent or imperfect. Brachyteles (or Eriodes) arachnoides is a Brazilian spider-monkey called the miriki. Ateles paniscus is the large black spider-monkey, or coïata; A. melanochir is the black-handed spider-monkey; and many more species or varieties of this genus have been named. One of the spider-monkeys, A. vellerosus, is among the most northerly of American monkeys, extending into Mexico to Orizaba and Oajaca. The flesh of some species is used for food, and the pelts have a commercial value. See also cut under Eriodes.

A Spider-monkey (Ateles paniscus).

spider-net (spī′dėr-net), n. Netting by spider-stitch.

spider-orchis (spī′dėr-ôr″kis), n. A Eurepean orchid, Ophrys aranifera. It has an erect stem from 9 to 18 inches high, with a few leaves near the base, and a loose spike of few small flowers with broad dull-brown lip and parts so shaped and arranged as somewhat to resemble a spider.

spider-shell (spī′dėr-shel), n. The shell of a gastropod of the family Strombidæ and genus Pteroceras; a scorpion-shell, having the outer lip expanded into a number of spines. The species inhabit the Indian and tropical Pacific oceans. See cut under scorpion-shell.

spider-stitch (spī′dėr-stich), n. A stitch in darned netting and in guipure, by which open spaces are partly filled with threads carried diagonally and parallel to each other, the effect of several squares together being that of a spider-web.

spider-wasp (spī′dėr-wosp), n. Any true wasp of the family Pompilidæ, which stores its nest with spiders for its young, as Ceropales rufiventris of North America, which lays its eggs in the mud nests of Agenia. See cut under Agenia.

spider-web (spī′dėr-web), n. The web or net spun by a spider; cobweb; gossamer. Also spider-cot.

spider-wheel (spī′dėr-hwēl), n. In embroidery, any circular pattern or unit of design open and having radiating and concentric lines. Compare catharine-wheel, 4.

spider-work (spī′dėr-wėrk), n. Lace worked by spider-stitch.

spiderwort (spī′dėr-wėrt), n. 1. A plant of the genus Tradescantia, especially T. Virginiea, the common garden species. It is a native of the central and southern United States, and was early introduced into European gardens. The petals are very delicate and ephemeral; in the wild plant they are blue, in cultivation variable in color, often reddish-violet.

Spiderwort (Tradescantia Virginica). 1, the inflorescence; 2, the lower part of the stem with the root.

2. By extension, any plant of the order Commelinaceæ; specifically, Commelina cœlestis, a blue-flowered plant from Mexico. The name is also given to Lloydia serotina, mountain-spiderwort; to Anthericum (Phalangium) Liliago, St. Bernard's lily; and to Paradisia (Czackia) Liliastrum, St. Bruno's lily—all Old World plants, the last two ornamental.

spidery (spī′dėr-i), a. [< spider + *-y*1.] Spider-like. Colgrave.

spiet†, v. and n. An old spelling of spy.

spiegel (spē′gl), n. [Short for spiegeleisen.] Same as spiegeleisen.—Spiegel-iron. Same as spiegeleisen.

spiegeleisen (spē′gl-ī″zen), n. [G., < spiegel (< L. speculum), a mirror, + eisen = E. iron.] A pig-iron containing from eight to fifteen or more per cent. of manganese. Its fracture often presents large well-developed crystalline planes. This alloy, as well as ferromanganese, an iron containing still more manganese than spiegeleisen, is extensively used in the manufacture of Bessemer steel, and is a necessary adjunct to that process. Also called spiegel-iron.

spiegelerz (spē′gl-erts), n. [G., < spiegel, a mirror, + erz, ore.] Specular ironstone: a variety of hematite.

spier1 (spī′ėr), n. [< spy + *-er*1.] One who spies; a spy; a scout. Halliwell.

spier2, v. See *speer*1.

spiffy (spif′i), a. [Origin obscure.] Spruce; well-dressed. [Slang, Eng.]

spificate (spif′li-kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. spificated, ppr. spificating. [Also spifflicate, smifligate; appar. a made word, simulating a L. origin.] 1. To beat severely; confound; dismay. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—2. To stifle; suffocate; kill. [Slang.]

So out with your whinger at once,
And scrag Jane while I spificate Johnny.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 166.

spification (spif-li-kā′shon), n. [< spificate + -ion.] The act of spificating, or the state of being spificated; annihilation. [Slang.]

Whose blood he vowed to drink—the Oriental form of threatening spification. R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, I. 264.

Spigelia (spi-jē′li-ą), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), named after Adrian van der Spiegel (1558–1625), a Belgian physician and professor of anatomy at Padua.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Loganiaceæ and tribe Euloganieæ, type of the subtribe Spigelieæ. It is characterized by flowers commonly disposed in one-sided spikes, the corolla with valvate lobes, a jointed style, and a two-celled ovary becoming in fruit a compressed twin capsule which is circumscissile above the cup-shaped persistent base. There are about 30 species, natives of America and mostly tropical, 5 extending into the United States; of these 2 are confined to Florida, 2 to Texas, and 1, S. Marilandica, the Maryland pinkroot or worm-grass, reaches Pennsylvania and Wisconsin. They are annual or perennial herbs, rarely somewhat shrubby, either smooth, downy, or woolly, bearing opposite feather-veined or rarely nerved leaves, which are connected by a line or transverse membrane or by stipules. The flowers are usually red, yellow, or purplish, and the many-flowered secund and curving spikes are often very handsome. In S. Anthelmia, the Demerara pinkroot, the flowers are white and pink, followed by purple fruit, and the two pairs of upper leaves are crowded in an apparent whorl. See pinkroot.

Spigelian (spi-jē′li-ąn), a. [< Spigel (see Spigelia) + -ian.] In anat., noting the lobulus Spigelii, one of the lobes of the liver.

spight2†, n. and v. An obsolete erroneous spelling of spite.

spignel, n. See spicknel.

spignet (spig′net), n. [A corruption of spikenard.] The American spikenard, Aralia racemosa. See spikenard.

spigot (spig′ot), n. [Early mod. E. also spiggot, spiggott, spiggotte, spyggotte, spygote, < ME. spigot, spyggot, spyggott, speget; obs. or dial. also spicket, < ME. spykket, spykette; appar. < Ir. Gael. spiocaid, a spigot (= W. ysbigod, a spigot, spindle), dim. of Ir. spīce = W. ysbig, a spike, < L. spica, spicus, a point, spike: see *spike*1. The Celtic forms may be from the E.] A small peg or plug designed to be driven into a gimlet-hole in a cask through which, when open, the contained liquor is drawn off; hence, by extension, any plug fitting into a faucet used for drawing off liquor.

He runs down into the Celtar, and takes the Spiggott. In the mean time all the Beer runs about the House.
Selden, Table-Talk, p. 63.

spigot-joint (spig′ot-joint), n. A pipe-joint made by tapering down the end of one piece and inserting it into a correspondingly widened opening in the end of another piece. Also called faucet-joint. E. H. Knight.

spigot-pot (spig′ot-pot), n. A vessel of earthenware or porcelain with a hole in the side, near the bottom, for the insertion of a spigot.

spigurnel†, n. [ML. spigurnellus; origin obscure.] In law, a name formerly given to the sealer of the writs in chancery.

These Bohuns . . . were by inheritance for a good while the king's spigurnells—that is, the sealers of his writs.
Holland, tr. of Camden, p. 312.

spike1 (spīk), n. [Early mod. E. also spyke; < ME. spik = Icel. spīk = Sw. spik, a spike, = Ir. spice = W. ysbig, a spike; cf. MD. spijcker, D. spijker = MLG. Spikes.

a, dock-spike, used in building docks and piers; b, cut-spike, or large cut nail; c, d, railway-spikes, for fastening rails to sleepers; e, barbed spike; f, barbed and forked spike; g, h, types of forked spikes, the points of which spread and become hooked in the timber when driven, thus making them extremely difficult to draw out.

2. A large nail or pin, generally of iron. The larger forms of spikes, particularly railroad-spikes, are chisel-pointed, and have a head or fang projecting to one side to bite the rail. Spikes are also made split, barbed, grooved, and of other shapes. See cut in preceding column.

3. An ear, as of wheat or other grain.

Bote yf the sed that sowen is in the sloh sterue,
Shall neuere spir springen vp, ne spik on strawe curne.
Piers Plowman (C), xiii. 180.

4. In bot., a flower-cluster or form of inflorescence in which the flowers are sessile (or apparently so) along an elongated, unbranched common axis, as in the well-known mullen and plantain. There are two modifications of the spike that have received distinct names, although not distinguishable by exact and constant characters. They are spadix and catkin. In the Equisetaceæ a spike is an aggregation of sporophyla at the apex of a shoot. Compare raceme, and see cuts under inflorescence, barley, papyrus, and Equisetaceæ. Hence—5. A sprig of some plant in which the flowers form a spike or somewhat spike-like cluster: as, a spike of lavender.

a, Spike of Plantago major; b, section of it, showing the sessile flowers.

The head of Nardus spreadeth into certaine spikes or eares, whereby it hath a twofold use, both of spike and also of leafe; in which regard it is so famous.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, xii. 12.

Within, a stag-horned sumach grows,
Fern-leafed, with spikes of red.
Whittier, The Old Burying-Ground.

spike1 (spīk), v. t.; pret. and pp. spiked, ppr. spiking. [< *spike*1, n.] 1. To fasten with spikes or long and large nails: as, to spike down the planks of a floor or a bridge.—2. spike-fish (spīk′-fish), n. A kind of sailfish, Histiophorus americanus, so called from the long sharp snout. See Histiophorus, and cut under sailfish.

spike-grass (spīk′gras), n. One of several American grasses, having conspicuous flower-spikelets. (a) Diplachne fascicularis. (b) Distichlis maritima (salt-grass). (c) The genus Uniola, especially U. paniculata (also called sea or seaside oats), a tall coarse grass with a dense heavy panicle, growing on sand-hills along the Atlantic coast southward.

spikehorn (spīk′hôrn), n. 1. The spike of a young deer.—2. A young male deer, when the antler is a mere spike.

spike-lavender (spīk′lav″en-dėr), n. A lavender-plant, Lavandula Spica. See *aspic*2, and oil of lavender (under *lavender*2).

spikelet (spīk′let), n. [< *spike*1 + -let.] In bot., a small or secondary spike: more especially applied to the spiked arrangements of two or more flowers of grasses, subtended by one or more glumes, and variously disposed around a common axis. See cuts under *Meliceæ, oat, orchard-grass, Poa, reed*1, 1, rye, and Sorghum.

spike-nail (spīk′nāl), n. A spike.

spikenard (spīk′närd), n. [< ME. spikenard, spykenarde, spyknard, spikanard, < OF. spiquenard (also simply espic, spīe) = Sp. espicanardi, espica nardo = Pg. spicanardo, espicanardo = It. spiganardo, formerly spigo nardo, = MD. spijknard = MHG. spicanarde, nardespieke, G. spieknard, < L. spica nardi, 'a spike of nard' (ML. also nardus spicatus, 'spiked nard'): L. spica, spike; nardi, gen. of nardus, nard: see spike[1] and nard.] 1. A plant, the source of a famous perfumed unguent of the ancients, now believed to be Nardostachys Jatamansi, closely allied to valerian, found in the Himalayan region. This plant is known to have been used by the Hindus as a medicine and perfume from a very remote period, and is at present employed chiefly in hair-washes and ointments. The odor is heavy and peculiar, described as resembling that of a mixture of valerian and patchouli. The market drug consists of short pieces of the rootstock densely covered with fibers, the remains of leafstalks. Also nard.

Spikenard (Nardostachys Jatamansi).

2. An aromatic ointment of ancient times, in which spikenard was the characteristic ingredient; nard. It was extremely costly.

There came a woman having an alabaster box of ointment of spikenard very precious, and she brake the box, and poured it on his head. Mark xiv. 3.

3. A name given to various fragrant essential oils.—American spikenard, a much-branching herbaceous plant, Aralia racemosa, with a short thick rootstock more spicy than that of A. nudicaulis, the wild sarsaparilla, and, like that, used in domestic medicine in place of true sarsaparilla. The A. nudicaulis is sometimes named small spikenard, while A. spinosa, the angelica-tree, has been called spikenard-tree.—Celtic spikenard, Valeriana Celtica of the Alps, Apennines, etc.—Cretan spikenard, Valeriana Phu, an Asiatic plant, sometimes cultivated in Europe, but medicinally weaker than the officinal valerian.—False spikenard, an American plant, Smilacina racemosa, somewhat resembling the true (American) spikenard. Also false Solomon's-seal.—Indian spikenard, the true spikenard. See def. 1.—Plowman's spikenard, a European plant, Inula Conyza, so called from its fragrant root and from being confounded with a plant by some writers called nardus rustica or clown's-nard. Prior.—Small spikenard. See American spikenard.—West Indian spikenard, a fragrant weed, Hyptis suaveolens, sometimes cultivated for medicinal use.

spikenard-tree (spīk′närd-trē), n. See American spikenard, under spikenard.

spikenelt, n. An obsolete form of spicknel, spignel.

spikenose (spīk′nōz), n. The pike-perch, or wall-eyed pike, Stizostedion vitreum. See cut under pike-perch. [Lake Ontario.]

spike-oil (spīk′oil), n. [= D. spijkolie; as spike[2] + oil.] The oil of spike. See spike[2], lavender[2].—Spike-oil plant, Lavandula Spica. See lavender[2].

spike-plank (spīk′plangk), n. Naut., a platform or bridge projecting across a vessel before the mizzenmast, to enable the ice-master to cross over and see ahead, and so pilot her clear of the ice: used in arctic voyages. Admiral Smyth.

spiker (spī′kėr), n. In rail-laying, a workman who drives the spikes.

spike-rush (spīk′rush), n. See Eleocharis.

A long splinter of wood, bone, ivory, or the like, such as is used in playing some games, as jackstraws.

The kitchen fire-irons were in exactly the same position against the back door as when Martha and I had skilfully piled them up like spillikins, ready to fall with an awful clatter if only a cat had touched the outside panels.
Mrs. Gaskell, Cranford, x.

2. pl. A game played with such pegs, pins, or splinters, as push-pin or jackstraws.—3. A small peg used in keeping count in some games, as cribbage.

spilling-line (spil′ing-līn), n. Naut., a rope occasionally fitted to a square sail in stormy weather, so as to spill the sail, in order that it may be reefed or furled more easily.

Reef-tackles were rove to the courses, and spilling-lines to the topsails. R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 347.

spill-stream (spil′strēm), n. In India, a stream formed by the overflow of water from a river; a bayou. See spill-channel.

The Bhagiraihi, although for centuries a mere spill-stream from the parent Ganges, is still called the Ganges by the villagers along its course.
Nineteenth Century, XXIII. 43.

spill-time† (spil′tīm), n. [ME. spille-tyme; < spill[1], v., + obj. time.] A waster of time; a time-killer; an idler.

A spendour that spende mot other a spille-tyme,
Other beggest thy bylyue a-boute at menne hacches.
Piers Plowman (C), vi. 28.

spill-trough (spil′trôf), n. In brass-founding, a trough against which the inclined flask rests while the metal is poured from the crucible, and which catches metal that may be spilled.

spillway (spil′wā), n. A passage for surplus water from a dam.

In wet weather the water in the two reservoirs flows away through the spillways or waste weirs beside the dams, and runs down the river into Croton Lake.
The Century, XXXIX. 207.

Spilochalcis (spī-lō-kal′sis), n. [NL. (Thomson, 1875), < Gr. σπίλος, a spot, speck, + NL. Chaleis: see Chaleis[1].] A genus of parasitic hymenopterous insects, of the family Chaleididæ, containing some of the largest species. The hind thighs are greatly enlarged, the abdomen has a long petiole, the thorax is maculate, and the middle tibiæ have spurs. The genus is very widely distributed, and the species destroy many kinds of insects. Some of the smaller ones are secondary parasites. S. mariæ is a common parasite of the large native American silkworms, such as the polyphemus and cecropia.

Spilogale (spī-log′a-lē), n. [NL., < Gr. σπίλος, a spot, + γαλῆ, contr. of γαλέη, a weasel.] A genus of American skunks, differing from Mephitis in certain cranial characters. The skull is depressed, with highly arched zygomata, well-developed postorbital and slight mastoid processes, and peculiarly bullous periotic region. S. putorius, formerly Mephitis bicolor, is the little striped or spotted skunk of the United States. It is black or blackish, with numerous white stripes and spots in endless diversity of detail. The length is scarcely 12 inches without the tail, which is shorter than the rest of the animal. The genus was named by J. E. Gray in 1865. See cut in next column.

Little Striped Skunk (Spilogale putorius).

Spilornis (spī-lôr′nis), n. [NL. (G. R. Gray, 1840), < Gr. σπίλος, a spot, + ὄρνις, a bird.] A genus of large spotted and crested hawks, of the family Falconidæ, having the tarsi bare below, the nostrils oval and perpendicular, and the crest-feathers rounded. There are several species of India, and thence through the Indo-Malayan region to Celebes and the Sulu and Philippine Islands. The best-known is the cheela, S. cheela, of India. The bacha, S. bacha, inhabits Java, Sumatra, and Malacca; S. pallidus is found in Borneo, S. rufipectus in Celebes, S. sulænsis in the Sulu Islands, and S. holospilus in the Philippines.

Crested Serpent-eagle, or Cheela (Spilornis cheela).

spilosite (spī′lō-sīt), n. [Irreg. < Gr. σπίλος, a spot, + -ite[2].] A name given by Zincken to a rock occurring in the Harz, near the borders of the granitic mass of the Ramberg, apparently the result of contact metamorphism of the slate in the vicinity of granite or diabase. The most prominent visible feature of this change in the slate is the occurrence of spots; hence the rock has been called by the Germans Fleckenschiefer, while rocks of a similar origin, but striped instead of spotted, are known as Bandschiefer. Similar phenomena of contact metamorphism have been observed in other regions and described by various authors, and such altered slates are called by English geologists spotted schists, chiastolite schists, andalusite schists, etc.

Spilotes (spī-lō′tēz), n. [NL. (Wagler, 1830), as if < Gr. σπιλωτής*, < σπιλοῦν, stain, < σπίλος, a spot.] A genus of colubrine serpents, having smooth equal teeth, one median dorsal row of scales, internasals not confluent with nasals, two prefrontals, two nasals, one preocular, the rostral not produced, and the anal scute entire. S. couperi is a large harmless snake of the South Atlantic and Gulf States, sometimes 6 or 8 feet long, of a black color shading into yellow below, and known as the indigo- or gopher-snake. This genus was called Georgia by Baird and Girard in 1853.

spilt (spilt). A preterit and past participle of spill[1].

spilter† (spil′tėr), n. Same as speller[3].

spilth (spilth), n. [< spill[1] + -th[3]. Cf. tilth.] That which is spilled; that which is poured out lavishly.

Our vaults have wept
With drunken spilth of wine.
Shak., T. of A., ii. 2. 169.

Burned like a spilth of light
Out of the crashing of a myriad stars.
Browning, Sordello.

spilus (spī′lus), n. [NL., < Gr. σπίλος, a spot, blemish.] 1. Pl. spili (-lī). In anat. and pathol., a spot or discoloration; a nævus or birth-mark.—2. [cap.] In entom., a genus of elaterid beetles, confined to South America. Candèze, 1859.

spin (spin), v.; pret. spun (formerly also span), pp. spun, ppr. spinning. [< ME. spinnen, spynnen (pret. span, pl. sponne, pp. sponnen), < AS. spinnan (pret. spann, pp. spunnen) = D. spinnen = MLG. LG. spinnen = OHG. spinnan, MHG. G. spinnen = Icel. Sw. spinna = Dan. spinde = Goth. spinnan, spin; prob. related to span (AS. spannan, etc.), < Teut. √ span, draw out: see span[1]. Hence ult. spinner, spindle, spinster, spider.] I. trans. 1. To draw out and twist into threads, either by the hand or by machinery: as, to spin wool, cotton, or flax.

All the yarn she [Penelope] spun in Ulysses' absence did but fill Ithaca full of moths. Shak., Cor., i. 3. 93.

For plain truths lose much of their weight when they are rarify'd into subtilties, and their strength is impaired when they are spun into too fine a thread.
Stillingfleet, Sermons, 1. iv.

The number of strands of gut spun into a cord varies with the thickness of catgut required.
Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 320.

2. To make, fabricate, or form by drawing out and twisting the materials of: as, to spin a thread or a web; to spin glass.

O fatal sustren! which, er any cloth
Me shapen was, my deateyne me sponne.
Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 734.

She, them saluting, there by them sate still,
Beholding how the thrids of life they span.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. ii. 49.

What Spinster Witch could spin such Thread
He nothing knew. Congreve, An Impossible Thing.

There is a Wheel that's turn'd by Humane power, which Spins Ten Thousand Yards of Glass in less than half an hour. Advertisement quoted in Ashton's Social Life [in Reign of Queen Anne, I. 290.

3. To form by the extrusion in long slender filaments or threads of viscous matter which hardens in air: said of the spider, the silkworm, and other insects: as, to spin silk or gossamer; to spin a web or cocoon.—4. Figuratively, to fabricate or produce in a manner analogous to the drawing out and twisting of wool or flax into threads, or to the processes of the spider or the silkworm: sometimes with out.

When they [letters] are spun out of nothing, they are nothing, or but apparitions and ghosts, with such hollow sounds as he that hears them knows not what they said.
Donne, Letters, xlvii.

Those accidents of time and place which obliged Greece to spin most of her speculations, like a spider, out of her own bowels. De Quincey, Style, iv.

5. To whirl rapidly; cause to turn rapidly on its own axis by twirling: as, to spin a top; to spin a coin on a table.

If the ball were spun like a top by the two fingers and thumb, it would turn in the way indicated by the arrow in the diagram. St. Nicholas, XVII. 826.

6. To fish with a swivel or spoon-bait: as, to spin the upper pool.—7. In sheet-metal work, to form in a lathe, as a disk of sheet-metal, into a globe, cup, vase, or like form. The disk is fitted to the live spindle, and is pressed and bent by tools of various forms. The process is peculiarly suitable to plated ware, as the thin coating of silver is not broken or disturbed by it. Called in French repoussé sur tour.

8. To reject at an examination; "send spinning." [Slang.]

"When must you go, Jerry?" "Are you to join directly, or will they give you leave?" "Don't you funk being spun?" "Is it a good regiment? How jolly to dine at mess every day!" Whyte Melville, White Rose, I. x.

Spun glass, silk. See the nouns.—Spun gold, gold thread prepared for weaving in any manner; especially, that prepared by winding a very thin and narrow flat ribbon of gold around a thread of some other material.—Spun silver, silver thread for weaving. Compare spun gold.—Spun yarn (naut.), a line or cord formed of rope-yarns twisted together, used for serving ropes, bending sails, etc.—To spin a yarn, to tell a long story: originally a seaman's phrase. [Colloq.]—To spin hay (milit.), to twist hay into ropes for convenient carriage.—To spin out, to draw out tediously; prolong by discussion, delays, wordiness, or the like; protract: as, to spin out the proceedings beyond all patience.

By one delay after another, they spin out their whole lives. Sir R. L'Estrange.

Do you mean that the story is tediously spun out?
Sheridan, The Critic, i. 1.

He endeavoured, however, to gain further time by spinning out the negotiation. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 13.

To spin street-yarn, to gad abroad; spend much time in the streets. [Slang, New Eng.]

II. intrans. 1. To form threads by drawing out and twisting the fiber of wool, cotton, flax, and the like, especially with the distaff and spindle, with the spinning-wheel, or with spinning-machinery.

Deceite, wepyng, spynnyng, God hath yeve
To wommen kyndely.
Chaucer, Prol. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 401.

When Adam dalve, and Eve span,
Who was then a gentleman?
Bp. Pilkington, Works (Parker Soc.), p. 125.

2. To form threads out of a viscous fluid, as a spider or silkworm.—3. To revolve rapidly; whirl, as a top or a spindle.

Let the great world spin for ever down the ringing grooves of change. Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

4. To issue in a thread or small stream; spirt.

Make incision in their hides,
That their hot blood may spin in English eyes.
Shak., Hen. V., iv. 2. 10.

The sharp streams of milk spun and foamed into the pail below. R. T. Cooke, Somebody's Neighbors, p. 84.

5. To go or move rapidly; go fast: as, to spin along the road. [Colloq.]

While it [money] lasts, make it spin. W. Collins, Hide and Seek, II. 4.

The locomotive spins along no less merrily because ten carloads of rascals may be profiting by its speed. S. Lanier, The English Novel, p. 3.

6. To use a spinner or spinning-spoon; troll: as, to spin for trout.—7. To be made to revolve, as a minnow on the trolling-spoon. The minnow is fastened on a gang of small hooks that are thrust into its back and sides to so bend it that it may turn round and round when dragged through the water. —Spinning dervish. See dervish.

spin (spin), n. [< spin, v.] 1. A rapid revolving or whirling motion, as that of a top on its axis; a rapid twirl: as, to give a coin a spin.

She found Nicholas busily engaged in making a penny spin on the dresser, for the amusement of three little children. . . . He, as well as they, was smiling at a good long spin. Mrs. Gaskell, North and South, xxxix.

2. A continued rapid motion or action of any kind; a spirited dash or run; a single effort of high speed, as in running a race; a spurt. [Colloq.]—3. In math., a rotation-velocity considered as represented by a line, the axis of rotation, and a length marked upon that line proportional to the number of turns per unit of time. W. K. Clifford.

spina (spī′nä), n.; pl. spinæ (-nē). [< L. spina, a thorn, prickle, the backbone: see spine.] 1. In zoöl. and anat.: (a) A spine, in any sense. (b) The spine, or spinal column; the backbone: more fully called spina dorsalis or spina dorsi, also columna spinalis.—2. [cap.] [NL.] In ornith., a genus of fringilline birds, the type of which is S. lesbia of southern Europe. Kaup, 1829. Also called Busvarla. See Spinus.—3. In Rom. antiq., a barrier dividing the hippodrome longitudinally, about which the racers turned.—4. One of the quills of a spinet or similar instrument.—Erector spinæ, multifidus spinæ, rotatores spinæ. See erector, multifidus, rotator.—Spina angularis. See spine of the sphenoid, under spine.—Spina bifida, a congenital gap in the posterior wall of the spinal canal, through which protrudes a sac, formed in hydrorachis externa of meninges, and in hydrorachis interna of these with a nervous lining. This forms a tumor in the middle line of the back.—Spina dorsalis, spina dorsi, the vertebral column.—Spina frontalis. See nasal spine (a), under nasal.—Spina helicis, the spinous process of the helix of the ear.—Spina mentalis, one of the mental or genial tubercles. See mental[2], genial[2].

spinaceous (spi-nā′shius), a. [< Spinacia + -ous (accom. to -aceous).] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of spinach, or the class of plants to which it belongs.

spinach, spinage (spin′äj), n. [(a) According to the present pron., prop. spelled spinage (early mod. E. also spynnage), this being an altered form of spinach (early mod. E. spinache); = MD. spinagie, spinazi, D. spinazie = LG. spinasie, < OF. spinache, espinache, espinage, espinace, espinoce, espinoche, espinoiche, etc., = Sp. espinaca = Cat. espinac = It. spinace, also spinacchia, < ML. spinacia, spinacium, also spinacius, spinachia, spinachium, spinathia, etc., after Rom. (NL. spinacia), spinach; cf. (b) Pr. espinar, OF. espinars, espinard, espinar, F. épinard, < ML. spinarius, spinarium, spinach; (c) G. Dan. spinat = Sw. spenat, spinat, < ML. spinatum*, spinach; (d) Pg. espinafre, spinach (cf. L. spinifer, spine-bearing); so called with ref. to the prickly fruit; variously formed, with some confusions, < L. spina, a thorn: see spine.] 1. A chenopodiaceous garden vegetable of the genus Spinacia, producing thick succulent leaves, which, when boiled and seasoned, form a pleasant and wholesome, though not highly flavored dish. There is commonly said to be but a single species, S. oleracea; but S. glabra, usually regarded as a variety, is now recognized as distinct, while there are two other wild species. The leaves of S. oleracea are sagittate, undivided, and prickly; those of S. glabra are larger, rounded at the base, and smooth. These are respectively the prickly-leaved and round-leaved spinach. There are several cultivated varieties of each, one of which, with wrinkled leaves like a Savoy cabbage, is the Savoy or lettuce-leaved spinach. All the species are Asiatic; the cultivated plant was first introduced into Europe by the Arabs by way of Spain.

2. One of several other plants affording a dish like spinach. See phrases below.—Australian spinach, a species of goosefoot, Chenopodium auricomum, a recent substitute for spinach; also, Tetragonia implexicoma, the Victorian bower-spinach, a trailing and climbing plant festooning bushes, its leaves covered with transparent vesicles as in the ice-plant.—Indian spinach. Same as Malabar nightshade. See nightshade.—Mountain spinach. See mountain-spinach.—New Zealand spinach, a decumbent or prostrate plant, Tetragonia expansa, found in New Zealand, Australia, and Tasmania, and also in Japan and southern South America. It has numerous rhomboid thick and succulent deep-green leaves.—Strawberry spinach. Same as strawberry-blite.—Wild spinach, a name of several plants locally used as pot-herbs, namely Chenopodium Bonus-Henricus and C. album, Beta maritima (the wild beet), and Campanula latifolia. [Prov. Eng.]

Spinachia (spī-nā′ki-ä), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817), < L. spina, a thorn, prickle, spine: see spine, and cf. spinach.] In ichth., a genus of marine gasterosteids. S. vulgaris is the common seastickleback of northern Europe.

Spinacia (spī-nā′si-ä), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < ML. spinacia, spinach: see spinach.] A genus of apetalous plants, of the order Chenopodiaceæ and tribe Atriplicæ. It is characterized by bractless and commonly dicœcious flowers, the pistillate with a two- to four-toothed roundish perianth, its tube hardened and closed in fruit, covering the utricle and its single erect turgid seed. There are 4 species, all Oriental (for which see spinach). They are erect annuals, with alternate stalked leaves which are entire or sinuately toothed. The flowers are borne in glomerules, the fertile usually axillary, the staminate forming interrupted spikes.

Spinacidæ (spī-nas′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spinax (-ac-) + -idæ.] A family of anarthrous sharks, typified by the genus Spinax; the dogfishes. There are 6 or more genera and about 20 species of rather small sharks, chiefly of the Atlantic. Also called Acanthiidæ, Centrinidæ, and Spinaces.

spinacine (spin′a-sin), a. [< Spinax (-ac-) + -ine[1].] Of or pertaining to the Spinacidæ.

spinacoid (spin′a-koid), a. and n. [< Spinax (-ac-) + -oid.] I. a. Resembling or related to the dogfish; of or pertaining to the Spinacidæ.

II. n. A member of the Spinacidæ; a dogfish.

spinage, n. See spinach.

spinal (spī′nal), a. [= F. spinal = Sp. espinal = Pg. espinhal = It. spinale, < LL. spinalis, of or pertaining to a thorn or the spine, < L. spina, a thorn, prickle, spine, the spine or backbone: see spine.] In anat.: (a) Of or pertaining to the backbone, spine, or spinal column; rachidian; vertebral: as, spinal arteries, bones, muscles, nerves; spinal curvature; a spinal complaint. (b) Pertaining to a spine or spinous process of bone; spinous: as, the spinal point (the base of the nasal spine, or subnasal point): specifically used in craniometry. [Rare.]—Accessory spinal nerve, or spinal accessory. Same as accessorius (b).—Acute, atrophic, and spastic spinal paralysis. See paralysis.—Spinal arteries, numerous branches, especially of the vertebral artery, which supply the spinal cord.—Spinal bulb, the medulla oblongata.—Spinal canal. See canal[1].—Spinal column, the spine or backbone; the vertebral column or series of vertebræ, extending from the head to the end of the tail, forming the morphological axis of the body of every vertebrate. In man the bones composing the spinal column are normally thirty-three—seven cervical, twelve dorsal or thoracic, five lumbar, five sacral, and four coccygeal. These form a flexuous and Human Spinal Column.

A, side view; B, same, in median sagittal section; C, front view; c, seven cervicals; d, twelve dorsals; l, five lumbars; s, five sacrals, fused in a sacrum; cd, four caudals or coccygeals, forming a coccyx.

flexible column capable of bending, as a whole, in every direction. It is most movable in the lumbar and cervical regions, less so in the dorsal and coccygeal, fixed in the sacral. Twenty-four of its bones are individually movable. The total length averages 26 or 27 inches. See vertebra, and cuts under backbone and spine.—Spinal cord, the main neural axis of every vertebrate, exclusive of the brain; the myelon, or the neuron without the encephalon; the spinal marrow, or nervous cord which extends in the spinal canal from the brain for a varying distance in different animals, and gives off the series of spinal nerves in pairs. The cord is directly continuous with the brain in all cranial vertebrates, and, with the brain, constitutes the neuron, or cerebrospinal axis, developed from an involution of epiblast in connection with a notochord (see cut under protovertebra). The cord is primitively tubular, and may retain, in the adult, traces of its cœlia (see rhombocœlia), comparable to the cœlia of the brain; but it generally solidifies, and also becomes fluted, or presents several parallel columns, from between certain of which the spinal nerves emerge. In man the cord is solid and subcylindrical, and extends in the spinal canal from the foramen magnum, where it is continuous with the oblongata, to the first or second lumbar vertebra. It gives off the spinal nerves, and may be regarded as made up of a series of segments, from each of which springs a pair of nerves; it is divided into cervical, thoracic, lumbar, sacral, and coccygeal regions, corresponding to the nerves and not to the adjacent vertebræ. There is an enlargement where the nerves from the arms come in (the cervical enlargement), and one where those from the legs come in (the lumbar enlargement). A cross-section of the cord exhibits a central H-shaped column of gray substance incased in white. (See figure.) The tracts of different functions are exhibited on one side of the cut; they are not distinguished in the adult healthy cord, but differ from one another in certain periods of early development, and may be marked out by secondary degenerations. The cord is a center for certain reflex actions, and a collection of pathways to and from the brain. The reflex centers have been located as follows: scapular, 5 C. to 1 Th.; epigastric, 4 Th. to 7 Th.; abdominal, 8 Th. to 1 L.; cremasteric, 1 L. to 3 L.; patellar, 2 L. to 4 L.; cystic and sexual, 2 L. to 4 L.; rectal, 4 L. to 2 S.; gluteal, 4 L. to 5 L.; Achilles tendon, 5 L. to 1 S.; plantar, 1 S. to 3 S. See also cuts under brain, cell, Petromyzontidæ, and Pharyngobranchii.—Spinal epilepsy, muscle-clonus, spontaneous or due to assuming some ordinary position of the legs, the result of increased myotatic irritability, as in spastic paralysis.—Spinal foramina, the intervertebral foramina.—Spinal ganglia. See ganglion.—Spinal marrow. Same as spinal cord.—Spinal muscles, the muscles proper of the spinal column, which lie longitudinally along the vertebræ, especially the epaxial muscles of the back, constituting what are known in human anatomy as the third, fourth, and fifth layers of muscles of the back (the so-called first and second "layers" of human anatomy being not axial, but appendicular). One of these is called spinalis.—Spinal nerves, the numerous pairs of nerves which arise from the spinal cord and emerge from the intervertebral foramina. In the higher vertebrates spinal nerves originate by two roots from opposite sides of that section of the spinal cord to which they respectively pertain—a posterior, sensory, or ganglionated root, and an anterior, motor, or non-ganglionated root, which usually unite in one sensorimotor trunk before emergence from the intervertebral foramina, and then as a rule divide into two main trunks, one epaxial and the other hypaxial. The number of spinal nerves varies within wide limits, and bears no fixed relation to the length of the spinal cord, which latter may end high in the dorsal region, yet give off a leash of nerves (see cauda equina, under cauda) which emerge from successive intervertebral foramina as far as the coccygeal region. The spinal nerves form numerous and intricate connections with the nerves of the ganglionic system. Their epaxial trunks are always few and small in comparison with the size, number, and extent of the ramifications of the hypaxial trunks, which latter usually supply all the appendicular and most of the axial parts of the body.—Spinal reflexes. See reflex.—Spinal veins, the numerous veins and venous plexuses in and on the spinal column, carrying off blood from the bones and included structures. In man these veins are grouped and named in four sets. See vena.

Cross-section of Human Spinal Cord.

AC, anterior column; AF, anterior fissure; AGC, anterior gray commissure; AH, anterior horn of gray matter; AR, anterior roots; AT, ascending anterolateral tract, or tract of Gowers; BC, postero-external column, or column of Burdach; Can., central canal; CC, Clarke's column; CPT, crossed pyramidal tract; CT, cerebellar tract; DPT, direct or uncrossed pyramidal tract; OT, anterolateral descending tract; GC, posteromedian column, or column of Goll; L, Lissauer's tract; LC, lateral column; LH, lateral horn or intermediolateral tract of gray matter with contained ganglion-cells; PC, posterior column; PF, posterior fissure; PGC, posterior gray commissure; PR, posterior root; SG, substantia gelatinosa; WC, anterior white commissure.

spinalis (spī-nā′lis), n.; pl. spinales (-lēz). [NL. (sc. musculus), < LL. spinalis, pertaining to a thorn: see spinal.] In anat., a series of muscular slips, derived from the longissimus dorsi, which pass between and connect the spinous processes of vertebræ: usually divided into the spinalis dorsi and spinalis colli, according to its relation with the back and the neck respectively.

spinate (spī′nāt), a. [< NL. spinatus, < L. spina, spine: see spine. Cf. spinach (d).] Covered with spines or spine-like processes.

Spinax (spī′naks), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817), < Gr. σπίνα or σπίνη, a fish so called.] A genus of dogfishes, giving name to the family Spinacidæ, and represented by S. niger or spinax, a small black shark of Europe.

Spindalis (spin'dā-lis), n. [NL. (Jardine and Selby, 1836); origin unknown.] A genus of thick-billed tanagers, of the family Tanagridæ, peculiar to the Antillean region. They have a comparatively long bill, ascending gonys, and swollen upper mandible; in the male the coloration is brilliant orange varied with black and white. There are 6 species, S. nigricephala, portoricensis, multicolor, pretrii, benedicti, and zena, respectively inhabiting Jamaica, Porto Rico, San Domingo, Cuba, Cozumel Island (off the Yucatan coast), and the Bahamas. The first-named builds a cup-shaped nest in trees or shrubs, and lays spotted eggs, and the others are probably similar in this respect. See cut under cashew-bird.

spindle (spin'dl), n. [Also dial. spinnel; < ME. spindle, spyndle, spindel, spyndel, spyndelle, spyndyl, spyndylle, < AS. spindle, spindel, earlier spinel, spinil, spinl (dat. spinele, spinle) (= MD. spille (by assimilation for spinle*), D. spil = OHG. spinnela, spinnila, spinnala, MHG. spinnele, spinnel, G. spindel (also spille, < D.) = Sw. Dan. spindel), a spindle, < spinnan, spin: see spin. Cf. spill[2].] 1. (a) In hand-spinning, a small bar, usually of wood, hung to the end of the thread as it is first drawn from the mass of fiber on the distaff. By rotating the spindle, the spinner twists the thread, and as the thread is spun it is wound upon the spindle.

> Sing to those that hold the vital shears,
> And turn the adamantine spindle round,
> On which the fate of gods and men is wound.
> Milton, Arcades, l. 66.

(b) The pin which is used in spinning-wheels for twisting the thread, and on which the thread, when twisted, is wound. See cut under spinning-wheel. (c) One of the skewers or axes of a spinning-machine upon which a bobbin is placed to wind the yarn as it is spun. See cut under spinning-jenny.—2. Any slender pointed rod or pin which turns round, or on which anything turns. (a) A small axle or axis, in contradistinction to a shaft or large axle, as the arbor or mandrel in a lathe: as, the spindle of a vane; the spindle of the fusee of a watch. See dead-spindle, live-spindle. (b) A vertical shaft supporting the upper stone or runner of a pair in a flour-mill. See cut under mill-spindle. (c) In vehicles, the tapering end or arm on the end of an axletree. (d) A small shaft which passes through a door-lock, and upon which the knobs or handles are fitted. When it is turned it withdraws the latch. (e) In ship-building: (1) The upper main piece of a made mast. (2) An iron axle fitted into a block of wood, which is fixed securely between two of the ship's beams, and upon which the capstan turns. (f) In founding, the pin on which the pattern of a mold is formed. (g) In building, same as newel[1]. (h) In cabinet-making, a short turned part, especially the turned or circular part of a baluster, stair-rail, etc.

3. Something having the form of a spindle (sense I); a fusiform object. (a) The grip of a sword. (b) A pine-needle or -leaf. [U. S.]

> We went into camp in a magnificent grove of pines. The roots of the trees are buried in the spindles and burrs which have fallen undisturbed for centuries.
> G. W. Nichols, Story of the Great March, xxii.

(c) The roll of not yet unfolded leaves on a growing plant of Indian corn.

> Its [the spindle-worm's] ravages generally begin while the cornstalk is young, and before the spindle rises much above the tuft of leaves in which it is embosomed.
> Harris, Insects Injurious to Plants.

(d) In conch., a spindle-shell. (e) In anat., a fusiform part or organ. (1) A spindle-cell. (2) The inner segment of a rod or cone of the bacillary layer of the retina. See cut under retina. Huxley, Crayfish, p. 121. (f) In embryol., one of the fusiform figures produced by chromatin fibers in the process of karyokinesis. Amer. Nat., XXII. 933.

4. In geom., a solid generated by the revolution of the arc of a curve-line about its chord, in opposition to a conoid, which is a solid generated by the revolution of a curve about its axis. The spindle is denominated circular, elliptic, hyperbolic, or parabolic, according to the figure of its generating curve.

5. A measure of yarn: in cotton a spindle of 18 hanks is 15,120 yards; in linen a spindle of 48 cuts is 14,400 yards.—6. A long slender stalk.

> The spindles must be tied up, and, as they grow in height, rods set by them, lest by their bending they should break.
> Mortimer.

7. Something very thin and slender.

> I am fall'n away to nothing, to a spindle.
> Fletcher, Women Pleased, Iv. 3.

Ring-spindle, a spindle which carries a traveling ring.—Spindle side of the house, the female side. See spear-side.

spindle (spin'dl), v. i.; pret. and pp. spindled, ppr. spindling. [< spindle, n.] To shoot or grow in a long, slender stalk or body.

> When the flowers begin to spindle, all but one or two of the biggest at each root should be nipped off. Mortimer.

spindle-cataract (spin'dl-kat″a-rakt), n. A form of cataract characterized by a spindle-shaped opacity extending from the posterior surface of the anterior part of the capsule to the anterior surface of the posterior part of the capsule, with a central dilatation. Commonly called fusiform cataract.

spindle-cell (spin'dl-sel), n. A spindle-shaped cell; a fusiform cell.—Spindle-cell layer, the deepest layer of the cerebral cortex, containing many fusiform with a few angular cells.—Spindle-cell sarcoma. See spindle-celled sarcoma, under sarcoma.

spindle-celled (spin'dl-seld), a. Made up of or containing spindle-shaped cells.—Spindle-celled sarcoma. See sarcoma.

spindle-legged (spin'dl-legd), a. Having long, thin legs; spindle-shanked.

> A pale, sickly, spindle-legged generation of valetudinarians. Addison, Tatler, No. 148.

spindle-legs (spin'dl-legz), n. pl. Long, slim legs; hence, a tall, thin person with such legs or shanks: used humorously or in contempt.

spindle-shanked (spin'dl-shangkt), a. Same as spindle-legged.

spindle-shanks (spin'dl-shangks), n. pl. Same as spindle-legs.

> A Weezel-faced cross old Gentleman with Spindle-Shanks. Steele, Tender Husband, i. 1.

spindle-shaped (spin'dl-shāpt), a. Circular in cross-section and tapering from the middle to each end; fusiform; formed like a spindle.

Spindle-shaped Root of Radish (Raphanus sativus).

spindle-shell (spin'dl-shel), n. In conch., a spindle-shaped shell; a spindle. (a) A shell of the genus Fusus in some of its applications, as F. antiquus, the common spindle or red-whelk, also called buckie or roaring buckie. See cuts under Fusus and Siphonostoma, 2. (b) A spindle-stromb. (c) A gastropod of the family Muricidæ and genus Chrysodomus, having a spindle-like or fusiform shape and the canal slightly produced. The species inhabit chiefly the northern cold seas. See cut under reverse.

spindle-step (spin'dl-step), n. In mill- and spinning-spindles, the lower bearing of an upright spindle. E. H. Knight.

spindle-stromb (spin'dl-stromb), n. A gastropod of the family Strombidæ and genus Rostellaria, having a spindle-like or fusiform shell with a long spire, and also a long anterior canal. The species inhabit the tropical Pacific and Indian oceans. See cut under Rostellaria.

spindletail (spin'dl-tāl), n. The pin-tailed duck, Dafila acuta. See pintail, I. [Local, U. S.]

spindle-tree (spin'dl-trē), n. A European shrub or small tree, Euonymus Europæa (E. vulgaris), growing in hedge-rows, on borders of woods, etc. It is so called from the use of its hard fine-grained wood in making spindles, and other uses have given it the names prick-timber, skewer-wood, and pegwood. It is one of the dogwoods. The name is carried over to the American E. atropurpurea, the wahoo or burning-bush, and to the Japanese E. Japonica; it is also extended to the genus, and even to the order (Celastrineæ).

spindle-valve (spin'dl-valv), n. A valve having an axial guide-stem. E. H. Knight.

spindle-whorl (spin'dl-hwėrl), n. See whorl.

spindle-worm (spin'dl-wėrm), n. The larva of the noctuid moth Achatodes (or Gortyna) zeæ: so called because it burrows into the spindle of Indian corn. See spindle, n., 3 (e). [Local, U. S.]

spindling (spind'ling), a. and n. [< spindle + -ing[2].] I. a. Long and slender; disproportionately slim or spindle-like.

II. n. A spindling or disproportionately long and slim person or thing; a slender shoot. [Rare.]

> Half-conscious of the garden-squirt,
> The spindlings look unhappy.
> Tennyson, Amphion.

spindly (spind'li), a. [< spindle + -y[1].] Spindle-like; disproportionately long and slender or slim. [Colloq.]

> The effect of all this may be easily imagined—a spindly growth of rootless ideas. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXVI. 556.

spindrift (spin'drift), n. [A var. (simulating spin, go rapidly) of spoon-drift, q. v.] Naut., the spray of salt water blown along the surface of the sea in heavy winds.

spine (spīn), n. [< OF. espine, F. épine = Pr. Sp. espina = Pg. espinha = It. spina, < L. spina, a thorn, prickle, also the backbone; prob. for spicna*, and akin to spica, a point, spike: see spike[1]. In the sense of 'backbone' spine is directly < L. spina. Hence spinach, spinage, spinal, spiny, spinet, spinney, etc.] 1. In bot., a stiff sharp-pointed process, containing more or less woody tissue, and originating in the degeneracy or modification of some organ. Usually it is a branch or the termination of a stem or branch, indurated, leafless, and attenuated to a point, as in the hawthorn, sloe, pear, and honey-locust; its nature is clearly manifest by the axillary position, and also by the fact that it sometimes produces imperfect leaves and buds. A spine may also consist of a modified leaf (all gradations being found between merely spiny-toothed leaves and leaves which are completely contracted into simple or multiple spines, as in the barberry), or of a persistent petiole, as in some Astragali and in Fouquieria, or of a modified stipule, as in the common locust. A spine is to be clearly distinguished from a prickle, which is merely a superficial outgrowth from the bark. See prickle, I.

2. The backbone; the rachis, spina, or spinal column of a vertebrate. The name is due to the series of spinous processes of the several vertebræ which it presents, forming a ridge along the middle of the back. See spinal column (under spinal), and vertebra, vertebral.

3. A name of some part in various animals. (a) In anat., a sharp process, point, or crest of bone; a spinous process, generally stouter than a styloid process: as, the spine of the ilium, of the ischium, of the acapula, of the pubis. See cuts under innominatum and shoulder-blade. (b) In morph., a bony element, or pair of bony elements, which completes a segment of either the neural canal or the hemal canal of a vertebrate on the midline of the dorsal or ventral aspect of the body, the ossification intervening dorsad between a pair of neurapophyses or ventrad between a pair of hemapophyses, the former being a neural spine, the latter a hemal spine. Thus, the spinous process of a dorsal vertebra is the neural spine of that vertebra, and the segment of the sternum with which the rib of that vertebra articulates is the hemal spine of the same vertebra. Owen. See cuts under dorsal, carapace, and endoskeleton. (c) In mammal., a modified hair; a sharp, stiff, hard, horny dermal outgrowth, as one of the quills of a porcupine, or of the prickles of the hedgehog or spiny ant-eater. In many animals the transition from soft fur through harsh or bristly pelage to spines is very gradual. See cuts under Echidnidæ, Erinaceus, and porcupine. (d) In ornith., a spur or calcar, as of the wing or foot; a mucro, as of a feather. See cuts under Palamedea, Rasores, and mucronate. (e) In herpet., a sharp, prickly scale of considerable size; a horn. See cuts under Cerastes and Phrynosoma. (f) In conch., any considerable sharp projection of the shell. Such spines are endlessly modified in size, shape, and site. Good examples are figured under murex, scorpion-shell, and Spondylus. (g) In Crustacea, any considerable spinous process of the carapace, of the legs, etc. Such spines are the rule with most crustaceans. The large tail-spine of some is specified as the telson. (h) In entom., any comparatively short sharp projection of the chitinous body-wall of an insect. Such occur commonly upon the larvæ of Lepidoptera, upon the bodies of many adult Coleoptera, Hemiptera, and Hymenoptera, and upon the legs (principally upon the tibiæ) of these and nearly all Orthoptera and many Neuroptera. The body-spines of adult insects are always of great use in classification. (i) In ichth.: (1) A fin-spine; one of the unjointed and unbranched sharp bony rays of the fins, such as those the presence of which gives name to the acanthopterygian fishes; a spinous fin-ray, as distinguished from a soft ray. See ray[1], 7, and the formula under radial, a. (2) A spinous process, as of an opercular bone. (3) The spinous process of some ganoid, placoid, etc., scales. See cuts under Echinorhinus, sand-fish, scale, sea-raven, and shackle-joint. (j) In echinoderms, one of the movable processes which beset the exterior, as of an echinus, and are articulated with the tubercles of the body-wall. Primary spines are the large ones forming continuous series along the ambulacral, as distinguished from less-developed secondary and tertiary spines. Other spines are specified as semital. See cuts under Cidaris, Echinometra, Echinus, semita, and Spatangus. (k) In general, some or any hard sharp process, like a spine; a thorn; a prickle: as, the spine at the end of the tail of the lion or the fer-de-lance.

a, b, c, spines (followed by soft rays) of the dorsal, ventral, and anal fins of an acanthopterygian fish: a, ten spines; b, one spine; c, three spines.

4. In mach., any longitudinal ridge; a fin. E. H. Knight.—5. In lace-making, a raised projection from the cordonnet: one of the varieties of pinwork; especially, one of many small points that project outward from the edge of the lace, forming a sort of fringe.—6. The duramen or heartwood of trees: a ship-builders' term. See duramen.—Angular curvature of the spine. See curvature.—Anterior superior spine of the ilium. See spines of the ilium.—Concussion of the spine, in theoretic strictness, a molecular lesion of the spinal cord too fine for microscopic detection, but impairing the functions of the cord, and produced by violent jarring, as in a railway accident: often applied, without discrimination, to cases which, after an accident, exhibit various nervous or spinal symptoms without any manifest gross lesion which explains them. These include cases of traumatic neurasthenia, of hemorrhage in the cord or its membranes, of displacement and fracture of vertebræ, and of muscular and ligamentous strains.—Ethmoidal spine, a projection of the sphenoid bone for articulation with the cribriform plate of the ethmoid.—Hemal spine. See def. 3 (b), and hemal.—Interhemal spine. See interhemal.—Interneural spine. See interneural.—Lateral curvature of the spine. See curvature.—Mental external spine, the mental protuberance of the human mandible.—Mental spines, the genial tubercles. See genial[2].—Nasal, pharyngeal, pleural spine. See the adjectives.—Palatine spine. See (posterior) nasal spine, under nasal.—Posterior superior spine of the ilium. See spines of the ilium.—Pubic spine. See below, and pubic.—Railway spine, concussion of the spine (especially in its more vague sense) resulting from railway accident.—Scapular spine. Same as spine of the scapula.—Sciatic spine, the spine of the ischium.—Semital spine. See semital.—Spine of the ischium, a pointed triangular eminence situated a little below the middle of the posterior border of the ischium, and separating the lesser from the greater sacrosciatic notch. In man the pudic vessels and nerve wind around this spine.—Spine of the pubis, the pubic spine, a prominent tubercle which projects from the upper border of the pubis about an inch from the symphysis.—Spine of the scapula, the scapular spine, in man a prominent plate of bone separating the supraspinous and infraspinous fossæ, and terminating in the acromion.—Spine of the sphenoid, a projection from the lower part of the greater wing of the sphenoid, extending backward into the angle between the petrous and squamous divisions of the temporal bone. Also called spinous process of the sphenoid.—Spines of the ilium, the iliac spines. In man these are four in number: the anterior extremity of the iliac crest terminates in the anterior superior spine, below which and separated from it by a concavity is the anterior inferior spine; in a similar manner the posterior extremity of the iliac crest terminates in the posterior superior spine, while below it is the posterior inferior spine, the two being separated by a notch.—Spines of the tibia, a pair of processes between the two articular surfaces of the head of the tibia, in the interior of the knee-joint, to which are attached the ends of the semilunar cartilages and the crucial ligaments of the joint.—Trochlear spine, a small spine-like projection upon the orbital part of the frontal bone for attachment of the pulley of the superior oblique muscle of the eye.

spine-armed (spīn′ärmd), a. Armed with spines or spiny processes, as a murex; spinigerous.

spineback (spīn′bak), n. A fish of the family Notacanthidæ.

spine-bearer (spīn′bār″ėr), n. A spine-bearing caterpillar.

spine-bearing (spīn′bār″ing), a. Having spines; spined or spiny; spinigerous.

spinebelly (spīn′bel″i), n. A kind of balloonfish, Tetraodon lineatus, more fully called striped spinebelly. See cut under balloon-fish.

spinebill (spīn′bil), n. An Australian meliphagine bird, Acanthorhynchus tenuirostris, formerly called slender-billed creeper, or another of this genus, A. superciliosus. In both these honey-eaters the bill is slender, curved, and extremely acute. They are closely related to the members of the genus Myzomela, but present a totally different pattern of coloration. The first-named is widely distributed on the continent and in Tasmania; the second inhabits western and southwestern Australia.

spined (spīnd), a. [< spine + -ed[2].] 1. Having a spine or spinal column; backboned; vertebrate.—2. Having spines; spinous or spiny: as, a spined caterpillar; the spined cicadas.—Spined soldier-bug. See soldier-bug.

spinefoot (spīn′fůt), n. A lizard of the genus Acanthodactylus, as A. vulgaris of northern Africa.

spinel (spin′el or spi-nel′), n. [Also spinelle, espinel; early mod. E. spinelle; < OF. spinelle, espinelle, F. spinelle = It. spinella, spinel; prob. orig. applied to a mineral with spine-shaped crystals; dim. of L. spina, a thorn, spine: see spine.] 1. A mineral of various shades of red, also blue, green, yellow, brown, and black, commonly occurring in isometric octahedrons. It has the hardness of topaz. Chemically, it consists of the oxids of magnesium and aluminium, with iron protoxid in some varieties, also chromium in the variety picotite. Clear and finely colored red varieties are highly prized as ornamental stones in jewelry. The red varieties are known as spinel ruby or balas ruby, while those of a dark-green, brown, or black color, containing iron protoxid in considerable amount, are called ceylonite or pleonaste. The valuable varieties, including the spinel ruby (see ruby), occur as rolled pebbles in river-channels in Ceylon, Burma, and Siam; they are often associated with the true ruby (corundum). The spinel group of minerals includes several species which may be considered as made up of equal parts of a protoxid and a sesquioxid ($RO+R_2O_3$). Here belong gahnite, magnetite, franklinite, etc. An octahedral habit characterizes them all.

There [in the Island of Zeilam] is also founde an other kynde of Rubies, which wee caule Spinelle and the Indians Caropus. R. Eden, tr. of Antonio Pigafetta (First Books [on America, ed. Arber, p. 264).

2. A bleached yarn from which the linen tape called inkle is made. E. H. Knight.—Zinc-spinel. Same as gahnite.

spineless (spīn′les), a. [< spine + -less.] 1. Having no spine or spinal column; invertebrate. Hence—2. Having no backbone, vigor, or courage; limp; weak; nerveless.—3. Having the backbone flexible or supple.

A whole family of Sprites, consisting of a remarkably stout father and three spineless sons.
Dickens, Uncommercial Traveller, iv. (Davies.)

4. In ichth., having no fin-spines; soft-finned; anacanthine; malacopterous: as, the spineless fishes, or Anacanthini.—Spineless perch, a pirate-perch.

spinellane (spi-nel′ān), n. [< spinelle + -ane.] A blue variety of nosean occurring in small crystalline masses and in minute crystals, found near Andernach on the Rhine.

spinelle (spi-nel′), n. See spinel.

spine-rayed (spīn′rād), a. In ichth., acanthopterygian.

spinescent (spī-nes′ent), a. [< L. spinescen(t-)s, ppr. of spinescere, grow thorny, < spina, a thorn, prickle, spine: see spine.] 1. In bot., tending to be hard and thorn-like; terminating in a spine or sharp point; armed with spines or thorns; spinose.—2. In zoöl., somewhat spinous or spiny, as the fur of an animal; very coarse, harsh, or stiff, as hair; spinulous.

spinet[1]† (spin′et), n. [< L. spinetum, a thicket of thorns, < spina, a thorn, spine: see spine. Cf. OF. spinat, F. dial. épinat, a thicket of thorns; and see spinney.] A small wood or place where briers and thorns grow; a spinney.

A satyr, lodged in a little spinet, by which her majesty and the Prince were to come, . . . advanced his head above the top of the wood. B. Jonson, The Satyr.

spinet[2] (spin′et or spi-net′), n. [Formerly also spinnet, espinette; = D. spinet = G. Sw. spinett = Dan. spinet, < OF. espinette, F. épinette = Sp. Pg. espineta, < It. spinetta, a spinet, or pair of virginals (said to be so called because struck with a pointed quill), < spinetta, a point, spigot, etc., dim. of spina, a thorn, < L. spina, a thorn: see spine.] A musical instrument essentially similar to the harpsichord, but of smaller size and much lighter tone. Also called virginal and couched harp.—Dumb spinet. Same as manichord.

spinetail (spīn′tāl), n. In ornith.: (a) A passerine bird of the family Dendrocolaptidæ, having stiff and more or less acuminate tail-feathers, much like a woodpecker's; a spine-tailed or sclerurine bird. See cuts under saberbill and Sclerurus. (b) A cypseline bird of the subfamily Chæturinæ; a spine-tailed or chæturine swift, having mucronate shafts of the tail-feathers. See Acanthyllis, and cut under mucronate. (c) The ruddy duck, Erismatura rubida. [Pennsylvania and New Jersey.]

spine-tailed (spīn′tāld), a. 1. In ornith.: (a) Having stiff and generally acuminate tail-feathers; dendrocolaptine; sclerurine. (b) Having mucronato shafts of the tail-feathers; chæturine.—2. In herpet., having the tail ending in a spine, as a serpent. See fer-de-lance, and cuts under Craspidocephalus and Cyclura.—3. In entom., having the abdomen ending in a spine or spines. The Scoliidæ are known as spine-tailed wasps, and the Sapygidæ have been called parasitic spine-tailed wasps. See cut under Elis.

spine-tipped (spīn′tipt), a. In bot., tipped with or bearing at the extremity a spine, as the leaves of agave.

spin-house† (spin′hous), n. A place in which spinning is carried on. Also spinning-house. See the quotation.

As we returned we stepp'd in to see the Spin-house, a kind of Bridewell, where incorrigible and lewd women are kept in discipline and labour.
Evelyn, Diary, Aug. 19, 1641.

spinicerebrate (spī-ni-ser′ē-brāt), a. [< L. spina, the spine, + cerebrum, the brain, + -ate[1].] Having a brain and spinal cord; cerebrospinal; myelencephalous.

spinideltoid (spī-ni-del′toid), a. and n. [< L. spina, the spine, + E. deltoid.] I. a. Representing that part of the human deltoid muscle which arises from the spine of the scapula, as a muscle; pertaining to the spinideltoideus.

II. n. The spinideltoidens.

spinideltoideus (spī″ni-del-toi′dē-us), n.; pl. spinideltoidei (-ī). [NL.: see spinideltoid.] A muscle of the shoulder and arm of some animals, corresponding to the spinal or mesoscapular part of the human deltoideus: it extends from the mesoscapula and metacromion to the deltoid ridge of the humerus.

spiniferite (spī-nif′ē-rīt), n. [< L. spinifer, bearing spines (see spiniferous), + -ite[2].] A certain minute organism beset with spines, occurring in the Chalk flints. Their real nature is unascertained, but they have been supposed to be the gemmules of sponges.

spiniferous (spī-nif′ē-rus), a. [< L. spinifer, bearing spines, < spina, a thorn, spine, + ferre = E. bear[1].] Bearing or provided with spines; spinous or spiny; spinigerous.

spiniform (spī′ni-fôrm), a. [< L. spina, a thorn, spine, + forma, form.] Having the form of a spine or thorn; spine-like. Huxley.

spinigerous (spī-nij′ē-rus), a. [< LL. spiniger, bearing thorns or spines, < L. spina, a thorn, spine, + gerere, bear, carry.] Bearing spines, as a hedgehog; spinose; aculeate; spiniferous.—Spinigerous elytra, in entom., elytra each one of which has an upright sutural process, the two uniting, when the elytra are closed, to form a large spiniform process on the back, as in certain phytophagous beetles.

Spinigrada (spī-nig′ra-dä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of spinigradus: see spinigrade.] An order of echinoderms, composed of the ophiurans and euryaleans, or the brittle-stars and gorgon's-heads. Forbes. [Rare.]

spinigrade (spī′ni-grād), a. [< NL. spinigradus, < L. spina, a thorn, spine, + gradi, walk, go: see grade[1].] Moving by means of spines or spinous processes, as an echinoderm; of or pertaining to the Spinigrada.

spininess (spī′ni-nes), n. Spiny character or state. (a) Thorniness. (b†) Sleuderness; slimness; lankness.

The old men resemble grasshoppers for their cold and bloodless spininess. Chapman, Iliad, iii., Commentarius.

spinirector (spī-ni-rek′tor), a. and n. [< L. spina, the spine, + rector for NL. erector, q. v.] I. a. Erecting, extending, or straightening the spine, or spinal column: noting the set or series of muscles of the back of which the erector spinæ is the basis.

II. n. The erector spinæ. (See erector.) It corresponds to the so-called fourth layer of the muscles of the back in human anatomy. Coues and Shute, 1887.

spinispicule (spī-ni-spik′ūl), n. [< L. spina, a spine, + E. spicule.] A spiny sponge-spicule; a spiraster.

spinispirula (spī-ni-spir′ō-lä), n.; pl. spinispirulæ (-lē). [NL., < L. spina, a spine, + spirula, a small twisted cake, dim. of spira, a coil, spire: see spire[2].] A spiny sigmaspire; a sigmoid microsclere or flesh-spicule provided with spines. Also called spiraster. Sollas.

spinispirular (spī-ni-spir′ō-lär), a. [< spinispirula + -ar[3].] Spiny and slightly spiral, as a sponge-spicule; having the character of a spinispirula. Sollas.

spinispirulate (spī-ni-spir′ō-lāt), a. [< spinispirula + -ate[1].] Same as spinispirular.

spinitis (spi-nī′tis), n. [NL., < L. spina, the spine, + -itis.] Inflammation of the spinal cord and its membranes, in the horse and other domestic quadrupeds.

spinitrapezius (spī″ni-trā-pē′zi-us), n.; pl. spinitrapezii (-ī). [NL., < L. spina, the spine, + NL. trapezius.] The spinal as distinguished from the cranial part of the trapezius muscle, forming in some animals a nearly distinct muscle.

spink[1] (spingk), n. [< ME. spink, spynk, spynke = Sw. dial. spink, also spikke, spekke, a sparrow (gull-spink, a goldfinch), = Norw. spikke (for spinke*), a sparrow or other small bird; cf. Gr. σπίγγος, also σπίζα, a finch (< σπίζειν, chirp); an imitative name, like the equiv. pink[5], finch[1].] The chaffinch, Fringilla cœlebs. [Prov. Eng.]

The spink chants sweetest in a hedge of thorns.
W. Harte.

spink[2] (spingk), n. [Origin obscure; prob. in part a var. of pink[2].] The primrose, Primula veris; also, the lady's-smock, Cardamine pratensis (also bog-spinks), and some other plants. [Scotland.]

spinnaker (spin′ä-kėr), n. [Said to be < spin, in sense of 'go rapidly.'] A jib-headed racing-sail carried by yachts, set, when running before the wind, on the side opposite to the mainsail.

spinnel (spin′el), n. A dialectal variant of spindle.

spinner[1] (spin′ėr), n. [< ME. spinnere, spynner, spinnare (= D. G. spinner = Sw. spinnare = Dan. spinder); < spin + -er[1]. Cf. spider.] 1. One who or that which spins, in any sense; one skilled in spinning. (a) A workman who gives shape to vessels of thin metal by means of a turning-lathe. See spin, v. t., 8. (b) In woolen-manuf., any thread-spinning machine; a drawing and twisting machine for making woolen threads. (c) A trawling fish-hook fitted with wings to make it revolve in the water; a propeller spoon-bait. (d) In hat-manuf., a machine for finishing the exterior of a hat. It consists of a flat oval table with a face corresponding to the curve of the hat-brim.

2. A spider; especially, a spinning-spider.

As if thou hadst borrowed legs of a spinner and a voice of a cricket. B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, i. 1.

3. See the quotation. [Eng.]

I do not know whether the daddy longlegs is ever called "gin spinner"; but Jenny Spinner is certainly the name of a very different insect, viz. the metamorphosis of the iron-blue dun, which, according to Ronald's nomenclature, is an ephemera of the genus Cloë.
N. and Q., 7th ser., VI. 153.

4. A spinneret.—5. The night-jar or night-churr, Caprimulgus europæus: from its cries, which may be likened to the noise of a spinning-wheel. See cut under night-jar. Also wheel-bird. Compare reeler in like use for another bird. [Wexford, Ireland.]—Ring-and-traveler spinner. Same as ring-frame.

spinner²†, n. [ME. spynner; origin obscure.] A kind of boat.

As on Monday next after May day there come tydyngs to London, that on Thorsday before the Duke of Suffolk come unto the coastes of Kent full nere slower with his ij. shepes and a litel spynner; the qweche spynner he sente with certeyn letters to certeyn of his trustid men.
Paston Letters, I. 124.

spinneret (spin'ėr-et), n. [< *spinner*¹ + -et.] A part or organ concerned in the spinning of silk, gossamer, or cobweb, as of a silkworm or spider. Specifically—(a) One of the mammillæ of the arachnidium of a spider; one of the four, six, or eight little conical or nipple-like processes under a spider's abdomen and near its end, through which the viscid secretion of the arachnidial glands is spun out into threads of silk. Some of the spinnerets are three-jointed. See arachnidium. (b) One of the tubules of the labium of certain caterpillars, as silkworms, through which silk is spun out of the secretion of glands connected with the mouth-parts. See sericterium. (c) One of the tubules of the anal segment of certain coleopterous larvæ, as in the first larval stage (triungulin) of some blister-beetles (Meloidæ), through which a little silk is spun. See cut under Sitaris. (d) A like organ of any other insect.

spinnerular (spi-ner'ū-lär), a. [< spinnerule + *-ar*³.] Entering into the formation of a spinneret, as a tubule; of or pertaining to spinnerules.

spinnerule (spin'ėr-ūl), n. [< *spinner*¹ + -ule.] One of the several individual tubules which collectively form the spinneret of a spider.

spinnery (spin'ėr-i), n.; pl. spinneries (-iz). [= D. spinnerij, a spinning-house, = G. spinnerei = Sw. spinneri = Dan. spinderi, spinning, spinning-house; as spin + -ery.] A spinning-mill. Imp. Dict.

spinnet†, n. See *spinet*².

spinney, spinny² (spin'i), n. [< ME. spineye, spenne*, < OF. espinaye, espinoye, espinoie, F. épinaie, a thicket, grove, a thorny plot, < L. spinetum, a thicket of thorns, < spina, a thorn: see spine. Cf. *spinet*².] A small wood with undergrowth; a clump of trees or shrubs; a small grove or shrubbery.

As he sprent ouer a spenne, to spye the schrewe.
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 1895.

A land . . . covered with fine hedgerow timber, with here and there a nice little gorse or spinney.
T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, i. 1.

spinning (spin'ing), n. [< ME. spynnynge; verbal n. of spin, v.] 1. The act of one who spins.—2. The process of giving shape to vessels of thin metal by means of a turning-lathe.

spinning-frame (spin'ing-frām), n. A machine by which cotton thread was twisted hard and firm, so as to make it suitable for the warp of cotton cloth: the invention of Richard Arkwright. E. H. Knight.

spinning-head (spin'ing-hed), n. An early form of spinning-machine in which the drawing and twisting mechanisms are combined in one head.

spinning-house† (spin'ing-hous), n. Same as spin-house.

spinning-jack (spin'ing-jak), n. In cotton-manuf., a device for twisting and winding a sliver as it comes from the drawing-rollers. It is placed in the can, in which it rotates, the sliver being wound on a bobbin. E. H. Knight.

spinning-jenny (spin'ing-jen'i), n. A spinning-machine, invented by James Hargreaves

a, frame; b, frames supporting spindles; c, drum driven by the band e from the band-wheel f, and carrying separate bands (not shown) which separately drive each spindle; d, fluted wooden clasp which travels on wheels on the top of the frame, and in which the rovings are arranged in due order.

in 1767, which was the first to operate upon more than one thread. It has a series of vertical spindles, each of which is supplied with roving from a separate spool, and has a clasping and traversing mechanism by means of which the operator is enabled to clasp and draw out all the rovings simultaneously during the operation of twisting, and to feed the twisted threads to the spindles when winding on—the whole operation being almost exactly like hand-spinning, except that a large number of rovings are operated upon instead of a single one.

spinning-machine (spin'ing-ma-shēn'), n. 1. Any machine for spinning; a mule; a spinner. Specifically—2. An apparatus which spins continuously, as distinguished from the intermittent action of the mule. E. H. Knight.

spinning-mill (spin'ing-mil), n. A mill or factory where thread is spun.

spinning-mite (spin'ing-mīt), n. Any mite or acarid of the family Tetranychidæ; a red-spider.

spinning-organ (spin'ing-ôr'gan), n. The organ or apparatus by means of which a spider or caterpillar spins silk; an arachnidium, as of a spider. See cut under arachnidium.

spinning-roller (spin'ing-rō'lėr), n. One of the iron wheels, covered with various materials—as rubber, vulcanite, paper, or felt—running in pairs in the drawing mechanism of a spinning-machine.

spinning-spider (spin'ing-spī'dėr), n. A spider which spins cobwebs; specifically, a true spider or araneid, as distinguished from any other arachnidan, whether it actually spins or not.

spinning-wart (spin'ing-wârt), n. A spinneret; one of the papillæ or mammillæ out of which a spider spins silk. See cut under arachnidium. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 291.

spinning-wheel (spin'ing-hwēl), n. A machine for spinning wool, cotton, or flax into threads by hand. It consists of a wheel, band, and spindle, and a, bench; b, b', standards; c, driving band-wheel with flat rim, turned by the peg k held in the right hand of the spinner; d, cord-band, crossed at e and driving the speed-pulley f; g, cord-band imparting motion to the spindle h; i, thread in process of spinning.

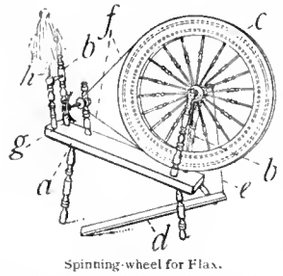
is driven by foot or by hand. Before the introduction of machinery for spinning there were two kinds of spinning-wheels in common use—the large wheel for spinning wool and cotton, and the small or Saxon wheel for spinning flax. The girdle-wheel was a spinning-wheel formerly in use, small enough to be fastened to a girdle- or apron-string, and used while standing or walking about.



Spinning-wheel for Flax.

a, bench or stool; b, standards; c, driving band-wheel grooved in its perimeter; d, treadle; e, rod which connects treadle with crank; f, cord-band which drives the flier-spindle; g, flier; h, distaff upon which the flax to be spun is placed, and which in use is held in the left hand of the operator.

spinny¹, n. See spinney.

spinny²†, a. [Appar. an irreg. var. of spiny, 3, or of spindly.] Thin; slender; slim; lank.

They plow it early in the year, and then there will come some spinny grass that will keep it from scalding.
Mortimer.

spinode (spī'nōd), n. [< L. spina, a thorn, spine, + nodus, a knot.] In geom., a stationary point or cusp on a curve. A spinode may be conceived as resulting from the vanishing of the angle at a node between the two branches, the length of arc between them being reduced to zero, just as an inflection may be regarded as resulting from the vanishing of the interval between the two points of tangency of a bitangent, the total curvature between them at the same time vanishing. But this view in the latter case includes all the points of the inflectional tangent as points of the curve, and in the former case includes all lines through the spinode as tangents. For this reason the spinode, like the inflection, is reckoned as a distinct kind of singularity. A curve cannot, while remaining real, change continuously from having a crunode to having an acnode without passing through a form in which it has a spinode.

spinode-curve (spī'nōd-kėrv), n. A singularity of a surface consisting in a locus of points where tangent-planes to the curve intersect it in curves having spinodes at those points. The spinode-curve on a real surface is the boundary between a synclastic and an anticlastic region. It bears no resemblance to that singularity of a surface termed the cuspidal curve.

spinode-torse (spī'nōd-tôrs), n. That torse of which a spinode-curve is the edge of regression. It is the envelop of tangent-planes to a surface intersecting it in curves having spinodes.

spinose (spī'nōs), a. [< L. spinosus, full of thorns: see spinous.] Full of spines; spinous; spinigerous or spiniferous; armed with spines or thorns; of a spiny character: as, a spinose leaf; a spinose stem.—Spinose maxillæ, in entom., maxillæ armed with spines at the apex, as in the dragon-fly.

spinosely (spī'nōs-li), adv. In bot., in a spinose manner.

spinosity (spī-nos'i-ti), n.; pl. spinosities (-tiz). [< L. spinositu(t-)s, thorniness, < spinosus, thorny, spiny: see spinous.] 1. The state of being spinous or spinose; rough, spinous, or thorny character or quality; thorniness: literally or figuratively.

The part of Human Philosophy which is Rational . . . seemeth but a net of subtilty and spinosity.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

2. A thorny part or thing; something thorny or crabbed.

spinous (spī'nus), a. [= F. épineux = Sp. espinoso = Pg. espinhoso = It. spinoso, < L. spinosus, full of thorns, thorny, spiny, < spina, a thorn, spine: see spine.] 1. In zoöl. and anat.: (a) Having spines; spiny; spinigerous or spiniferous. (b) Shaped like a spine; spiniform; having the character of a spine; sharp or pointed: as, a spinous process of bone. See spinose.—2. In bot., same as spinose.—Spinous foramen, the foramen spinosum of the sphenoid. See under foramen.—Spinous process of a vertebra, one of the elements of most vertebræ, usually autogenous, or having its own center of ossification, forming a process, point, or plate of bone where the lateral halves of the neural arch, or neurapophyses, come together behind (in man) or above the neural arch; a neural spine. See cuts under axis, cervical, dorsal, hypapophysis, lumbar, and vertebra.—Spinous process of the sphenoid. See spine of the sphenoid, under spine.—Spinous rat, a spiny rat, in any sense.—Spinous shark. See *shark*¹, and Echinorhinus (with cut).—Spinous spider-crab, Maia squinado, the common spider-crab.

spinous-radiate (spī'nus-rā'di-āt), a. In entom., rayed or encircled with spines.

Spinozism (spi-nō'zizm), n. [< Spinoza (see def.) + -ism.] The metaphysical doctrine of Baruch (afterward Benedict) de Spinoza (1632–1677), a Spanish Jew, born at Amsterdam. Spinoza's chief work, the "Ethics," is an exposition of the idea of the absolute, with a monistic theory of the correspondence between mind and matter, and applications to the philosophy of living. It is an excessively abstruse doctrine, much misunderstood, and too complicated for brief exposition. The style of the book, an imitation of Euclid's "Elements," is calculated to repel the mathematician and logician, and to carry the attention of the ordinary reader away from the real meaning, while conveying a completely false notion of the mode of thinking. Yet, while the form is pseudomathematical, the thought itself is truly mathematical. The main principle is, indeed, an anticipation in a generalized form of the modern geometrical conception of the absolute, especially as this appears in the hyperbolic geometry, where the point and plane manifolds have a correspondence similar to that between Spinoza's worlds of extension and thought. Spinoza is described as a pantheist; he identifies God and Nature, but does not mean by Nature what is ordinarily meant. Some sayings of Spinoza are frequently quoted in literature. One of these is omnis determinatio est negatio, "all specification involves exclusion"; another is that matters must be considered sub specie æternitatis, "under their essential aspects."

Spinozist (spi-nō'zist), n. [< Spinoza + -ist.] A follower of Spinoza.

Spinozistic (spi-nō-zis'tik), a. [< Spinozist + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of Spinoza or his followers: as, the Spinozistic school; Spinozistic pantheism.

spinster (spin'stėr), n. [< ME. spinster, spynstare, spinnestere, spynnester (= D. spinster), with suffix -estre (E. -ster), < AS. spinnan, spin: see spin.] 1. A woman who spins; by extension, any person who spins; a spinner.

My wif was a webbe and wollen cloth made.
Hu spak to the spynnesters to spynnen hit oute.
Piers Plowman (C), vii. 222.

The silkworm is Only man's spinster.
Randolph, Muses' Looking-Glass, iv. 1.

Let the three housewifely spinsters of destiny rather curtail the thread of thy life.
Dekker, Gull's Hornbook, p. 83.

2. An unmarried woman (so called because she was supposed to occupy herself with spinning): the legal designation in England of all unmarried women from a viscount's daughter downward; popularly, an elderly unmarried woman; an "old maid": sometimes used adjectively.

I, Anthony Lumpkin, Esquire, of Blank place, refuse you, Constantia Neville, spinster, of no place at all.
Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, v. 1.

O, that I should live to hear myself called Spinster!
Sheridan, The Rivals, v. 1.

Here the spinster aunt uttered a loud shriek, and became senseless. Dickens, Pickwick, x.

3†. A woman of an evil life or character: so called from being forced to spin in the house of correction. See spin-house.

We are no spinsters; nor, if you look upon us,
So wretched as you take us.
Fletcher (and another ?), Prophetess, iii. 1.

spinsterdom (spin'stėr-dum), n. [< spinster + -dom.] Spinsters or "old maids" collectively. G. Meredith, Manfred, ii. 2. [Rare.]

spinsterhood (spin'stėr-hůd), n. [< spinster + -hood.] The state of being a spinster; unmarried life or state.

spinstership (spin'stėr-ship), n. [< spinster + -ship.] Spinsterhood. Southey.

spinstress (spin'stres), n. [< spinster + -ess.] A woman who spins, or whose occupation is spinning; a spinster.

Let meaner souls by virtue be cajoled,
As the good Grecian spinstress [Penelope] was of old.
Tom Brown, Works, IV. 10. (Davies.)

spinstry† (spin'stri), n. [< spinster + -y[3] (cf. -ery).] The work or occupation of spinning; spinning.

What new decency can be added to this your spinstry?
Milton, Church-Government, ii. 2.

spintext (spin'tekst), n. [< spin, v., + obj. text.] One who spins out long dreary discourses; a prosy preacher.

The race of formal spintexts and solemn saygraces is nearly extinct. V. Knox, Winter Evenings, ix.

spinthere (spin'thēr), n. [= F. spinthère, < Gr. σπινθήρ, a spark.] A greenish-gray variety of sphene or titanite.

spintry† (spin'tri), n. [< L. spintria, splintria, a male prostitute.] A male prostitute. [Rare.]

Ravished hence, like captives, and, in sight
Of their most grieved parents, dealt away
Unto his spintries, sellaries, and slaves.
B. Jonson, Sejanus, iv. 5.

spinula (spin'ū-lą), n.; pl. spinulæ (-lē). [NL., < L. spinula, dim. of spina, a spine: see spine.] In entom., a minute spine or hook. Specifically — (a) One of the little hooks bordering the anterior edge of the lower wing in most Hymenoptera: same as hamulus, 1 (d). (b) One of the bristles forming the strigilis.

spinulate (spin'ū-lāt), a. [< spinula + -ate[1].] In zoöl., covered with little spines.—Spinulate hairs, hairs emitting minute rigid branches or spinules: such hairs cover many hymenopterous insects.

spinulated (spin'ū-lā-ted), a. [< spinulate + -ed[2].] Same as spinulate.

spinule (spin'ūl), n. [< L. spinula, dim. of spina, a thorn, spine: see spine.] A small spine; a spicule.

spinulescent (spin-ū-les'ẹnt), a. [< spinule + -escent.] In bot., producing diminutive spines; somewhat spiny or thorny.

spinuliferous (spin-ū-lif'ẹ-rus), a. [< L. spinula, a spinule, + ferre = E. bear[1].] In bot., same as spinulose.

spinulose (spin'ū-lōs), a. [< NL. spinulosus: see spinulous.] In bot. and zoöl., furnished with spinules or diminutive spines.

I have never seen any prominent spine upon the posterior elevation, though it is sometimes minutely spinulose.
Huxley, Crayfish, p. 234.

spinulous (spin'ū-lus), a. [< NL. spinulosus, < L. spinula, a spinule: see spinule.] Same as spinulose.

spinus (spī'nus), n. [NL., < Gr. σπίνος, a bird of the finch kind; cf. spink.] 1†. An old name of some small bird which feeds on seeds, as a thistle-bird, linnet, siskin, or bunting. Hence—2. [cap.] A genus of thistle-birds named by Koch in 1816, containing the linnet, the siskin or aberdevine, the goldfineh, the redpoll, and others, both of Europe and of America. In present usage, the siskin is Spinus spinus, the pine-finch is S. pinus, the goldfinch of Europe is S. carduelis, that of America is S. tristis, etc. The name wavers in application, and is more or less inexactly synonymous with several others, as Acanthis, Carduelis, Chrysomitris, Astragalinus, Ægiothus, Linaria, Linota, etc. See cuts under siskin and goldfinch.

spiny (spī'ni), a. [< spine + -y[1].] 1. Having thorns or spines; full of spines; thorny; prickly.—2. Figuratively, thorny; perplexed; difficult; troublesome.

The spiny deserts of scholastick philosophy.
Warburton, On Prophecy, p. 61. (Latham.)

3†. Thin; slim; slender.

As in well-grown woods, on trees, cold spiny grasshoppers Sit chirping Chapman, Iliad, iii. 161.

Faith, thou art such a spiny bald-rib, all the mistresses in the town will never get thee up.
Middleton, Mayor of Queenborough, iii. 3.

Spiny calamary, a cephalopod of the genus Acanthoteuthis. P. P. Carpenter.—Spiny crab, a crab whose carapace is spiny, or has spinous processes; a spider-crab or maioid. See cut under Oxyrhyncha.—Spiny fish, a spiny-finned or acanthopterygian fish.—Spiny lobster. See lobster.—Spiny rat, one of sundry small rat-like rodents whose pelage is more or less spiny. (a) One of the South American species of Echimys and Loncheres or Nelomys. See cut under Echimys. (b) One of several pouched rats of the genus Heteromys.

spiny-eel (spī'ni-ēl), n. See Mastacembelidæ.

spiny-finned (spī'ni-find), a. In ichth., having spinous fin-rays; spine-finned; acanthopterygious.

spiny-skinned (spī'ni-skind), a. Echinodermatous.

spion† (spī'ọn), n. [Early mod. E. also spyon; = D. G. Sw. Dan. spion, < OF. (and F.) espion, a spy: see spy. Cf. espionage.] A spy.

Captaine of the Spyons.
Heywood, Four Prentises of London (Works, 1874, II. 242).

spirt†, v. An obsolete form of speer[1].

spira (spī'rą), n.; pl. spiræ (-rē). [L., the base of a column, a spire: see spire[2].] In arch., the moldings at the base of a column; a torus. Such a molding or moldings are not present in the Greek Doric order of architecture, but the feature is constant in all varieties of the Ionic and Corinthian. See cuts under base[1], 3.

spirable† (spīr'ą-bl), a. [< L. spirabilis, that may be breathed, respirable, < spirare, breathe, blow: see spire[3].] Capable of being breathed; respirable.

The spirable odor and pestilent steame ascending from it put him out of his bias of congruity.
Nashe, Lenten Stuffe (Hsrl. Misc., VI. 173). (Davies.)

spiracle (spir' or spīr'ą-kl), n. [< ME. spyrakle, < OF. spiracle, vernacularly spirail, espirail = It. spiracolo, < L. spiraculum, a breathing-hole, air-hole, < spirare, breathe: see spire[3].] 1. An aperture or orifice.

And after XL dayes this spiracle
Is uppe to close, and whenne the [you] list, it [the wine] drinke. Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 202.

2. In zoöl., an aperture, orifice, or vent through which air, vapor, or water passes in the act of respiration; a breathing-hole; a spiraculum: applied to many different formations. Specifically — (a) In Mammalia, the nostril or blow-hole of a cetacean, as the whale, porpoise, etc., through which air, mixed with spray or water, is expelled. (b) In ichth.: (1) An aperture on the upper side of the head, in front of the suspensorium of the lower jaw, observed in many fishes, as selachians and ganoids. This is the external opening of the hyomandibular cleft, or persistent first postoral visceral cleft, of the embryo. (2) The single nostril of the monorhine vertebrates, or myzonts — the lampreys and hags. (c) In entom., a breathing-hole; the external orifice of one of the tracheæ or windpipes of an arachnidan or myriapod, opening in the side of the body. In true insects (Hexapoda) the spiracles are typically twenty-two in number, a pair (one on each side) for each of the three thoracic segments, and for each of the anterior eight abdominal segments; but they are almost always lacking on some one or more of these. They are either simple openings into the respiratory system, or are provided with valves, sieves, or fringes of hair for the exclusion of foreign particles. See cut under Systœchus.

spiraculá[1], n. Plural of spiraculum.

spiracula[2] (spī-rak'ū-lą), n.; pl. spiraculæ (-lē). [NL.: see spiracle.] In entom., same as spiracle.

spiracular (spī-rak'ū-lär), a. and n. [< spiraculum + -ar[3].] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a spiracle, breathing-hole, or blow-hole.—2. Fitted for or permitting respiration, as a spiracle; respiratory.—Spiracular arch, in ichth., one of the visceral arches of some fishes, between the mandibular and hyomandibular arches, in special relation with the spiracular cleft and spiracle.—Spiracular cleft, in ichth., the hyomandibular cleft: so called from its relations to the spiracle in certain fishes, as all selachians and various ganoids. See spiracle, 2 (b) (1).—Spiracular gill, a false gill, or pseudobranch.—Spiracular respiration, a breathing through spiracles, as in the tracheal respiration of many insects.

II. n. A small bone or cartilage in special relation with the spiracle of some fishes.

A series of small ossicles, of which two may be distinguished as spiracular. Encyc. Brit., XII. 648.

spiraculate (spī-rak'ū-lāt), a. [< spiraculum + -ate[1].] Provided with a spiracle.

spiraculiferous (spī-rak-ū-lif'ẹ-rus), a. [< L. spiraculum, a breathing-hole, + ferre = E. bear[1].] In entom., bearing a spiracle or breathing-pore: said of segments in which these organs are visible. See cut under Systœchus. Westwood.

spiraculiform (spī-rak'ū-li-fôrm), a. [< L. spiraculum, a breathing-hole, + forma, form.] In entom., having the structure, form, or appearance of a spiracle; stigmatiform.

spiraculum (spī-rak'ū-lum), n.; pl. spiracula (-lą). [L.: see spiracle.] 1. A spiracle, in any sense.—2. A breathing-hole in the aventaile, beaver, or mesail of a helmet.

spiræ, n. Plural of spira.

Spiræa (spī-rē'ą), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. spiræa, < Gr. σπειραία, meadow-sweet, so called from the shape of its follicles, < σπεῖρα, a coil, spire: see spire[2].] 1. A genus of rosaceous plants, type of the Spiræeæ. It is characterized by fruit commonly of five follicles, containing usually numerous linear seeds with a membranous or rarely coriaceous outer seed-coat and little or no albumen. The flowers have four or five calyx-lobes, as many rounded petals, twenty to sixty filiform stamens, and a smooth or woolly fleshy disk. The Himalayan S. parvifolia is an exception in its solitary seeds and obconical calyx. There are about 50 species, widely scattered through temperate and cold regions of the northern hemisphere, and occurring rarely on mountains within the tropics. They are herbs or shrubs, bearing alternate simple pinnate or ternately compound leaves, usually furnished with free or wing-like and united stipules. The small white, pink, or rose-colored flowers form a copious axillary or terminal inflorescence, which is either a raceme, cyme, panicle, or corymb, or consists, as in S. Aruncus, of a diffuse panicle composed of numerous elongated slender spikes. Most of the species are highly ornamental in flower. They are now most commonly known, especially in cultivation, by the generic name Spiræa. Eleven species are natives of Europe, 3 of which occur in England; of these S. Filipendula is the dropwort, and the others, S. salicifolia and S. Ulmaria, are known as meadow-sweet (the latter also as queen-of-the-meadows, which see). Six species are natives of the northeastern United States, of which S. salicifolia is the most widely distributed, a shrub with slender ascending spire-like branches, popularly known in the west as steeplebush, in America usually with white flowers, in Europe, Siberia, Mongolia, and Japan pink or rose-colored. It is often cultivated, especially in Russia, where a great many varieties have originated; in Wales it forms a large part of the hedges. For S. tomentosa, a similar pink-flowered eastern species, see hardhack; its representative on the Pacific coast, S. Douglasii, with handsome whitened leaves, is one of the most showy of American shrubs. For S. lobata, see queen-of-the-prairie, and for S. Aruncus, goat's-beard; the latter is one of the most ornamental plants of eastern woodland borders. For S. hypericifolia, common in cultivation from Europe and Siberia, and also called Italian may and St. Peter's wreath, see bridal-wreath. Several species from Japan are now abundant in ornamental grounds, as S. Japonica and its variety S. Fortunei, and S. prunifolia, the plum-leafed spiræa, a white-flowered shrub with handsome silky leaves. S. Thunbergii from Japan is much used in parks, forming a small diffuse shrub 2 or 3 feet high with light recurving branches whitened before the leaves with a profusion of small flowers usually in threes in the axils. Some Asiatic species with pinnate leaves and large terminal panicles of white flowers are arborescent, as S. sorbifolia, often seen as a shrub in New England dooryards, and S. Kamchatica, with the panicles very large, the flowers fragrant and feathery. The former S. opulifolia, the ninebark, and its variety aurea, the golden spiræa of gardens, are now referred to Neillia, or by some separated as a genus Physocarpus. Many species possess moderate astringent or tonic properties; the roots of the British species are so used, and the flowers of S. hypericifolia; S. Ulmaria is valuable also as a diuretic. S. tomentosa, the principal American medicinal species, a plant of bitter and astringent taste, is used in New England and also formerly by the Indians as a tonic.

Flowering Branch of Hardhack (Spiræa tomentosa).
a, flower; b, fruit; c, leaf.

2. [l. c.] (a) A plant of this genus. (b) The white-flowered shrub Astilbe Japonica, now extensively imported into the United States and propagated under glass, forming one of the chief materials of Easter decorations.

Spiræeæ (spī-rē'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1865), < Spiræa + -eæ.] A tribe of polypetalous plants, of the order Rosaceæ. It is characterized by flowers with bractless and commonly persistent calyx-lobes, ten or more stamens, from one to eight superior carpels, usually each with two or more pendulous ovules, either indehiscent or ripening into follicles, and not included within the calyx-tube. It consists of 10 genera, of which Spiræa is the type. They are usually shrubs, all natives of the northern hemisphere; Spiræa only is of wide distribution; 4 others are confined to North America, of which Neviusa is found only in Alabama, and Adenostoma in California. Four or five other genera are confined to Japan and China.

spiræic (spī-rē'ik), a. [< NL. Spiræa + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to or derived from Spiræa.—2†. Same as salicylic.

spiral (spī'ral), a. and n. [< F. spiral = Sp. Pg. espiral = It. spirale = D. spiraal = G. Sw. Dan. spiral, < ML. spiralis, spiral (linea spiralis, a spiral line, a spiral), < L. spira, a coil, spire: see spire[2].] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a spire or coil; like a spire; pointed or shaped like a spire. —2. Winding around a fixed point or center, and continually receding from it, like a watchspring; specifically, in conch., making a number of turns about the columella or axis of the shell; whorled. The whorls may be in one plane, producing the flat or discoid shell, or oftener wound into a spire, resulting in the ordinary turreted form. Compare cuts under Planorbis and Limnæa, and see spire[2], 2. 3. Winding and at the same time rising or advancing like a screw-thread: more accurately helical or helicoidal.

Flat Spiral of an Ammonite (Ammonites bifrons).

Where upward, in the mellow blush of day,
The noisy bittern wheeled his spiral way.
Longfellow, Sunrise on the Hills.

Spiral axis. See axis[1]. —Spiral balance, a form of balance in which the weight of the body under examination is measured by the stretching (torsion) of an elastic wire in the form of a long spiral. A common use of the simple form of spiral balance (see cut) is in determining the specific gravity of small fragments of minerals, which for this purpose are weighed first in the upper pan and then in that below, which is immersed in water. —Spiral canal of the cochlea, of the modiolus. See canal[1], and cut under ear[1]. —Spiral duct, in bot., same as spiral vessel. —Spiral fracture, a fracture of bone due to torsion, so that the broken ends have a more or less screw-like appearance. —Spiral gearing. See gearing. —Spiral layer, the middle one of the three layers or coats of the tracheal wall in insects. See tænidium and trachea. —Spiral ligament of the cochlea, the spiral ridge at the outer insertion of the basilar membrane: it is prismatic, or triangular in section. —Spiral line, the line connecting the radii or radiating lines of a geometrical spider's web, and forming a continuous spiral from the circumference nearly to the center. It is formed after the radii have been put in place. —Spiral nebula, phyllotaxis, plexus. See the nouns. —Spiral point. See spire[2], 3. —Spiral pteropods, the Limacinidæ. —Spiral pump, a form of the Archimedean screw water-elevator. See Archimedean screw, under Archimedean. —Spiral screw. See screw[1]. —Spiral space, the area bounded at its two ends by successive parts of the same radius vector, and within and without by successive parts of the same spiral. —Spiral spring. See spring. —Spiral valve, in ichth., a continuous fold or ridge of mucous membrane which winds spirally about the interior of the intestine of some fishes, as ganoids. —Spiral vessel, in bot., a vessel which is usually long, with fusiform extremities, and has the walls thickened in a spiral manner with one or more simple or branched bands or fibers. In most cases the direction of the spiral is from right to left, but it frequently happens that the earlier formed spirals run in one direction, while those formed later run in an opposite direction. See tissue, vessel. —Spiral wheels, in mach. See wheel.

Spiral Balance for determining specific gravities.

Spiral Vessels or Ducts of Erbaltium Elaterium.

II. n. 1. In geom., a plane curve which runs continuously round and round a fixed point, called the center, with constantly increasing radius vector, so that the latter is never normal to the curve; also, a part of such a curve in the course of which the radius from the center describes 360°. Besides the spirals mentioned below, the involute of the circle and the cyclodes are very important. The principal spirals which have received attention are the spiral of Archimedes (usually understood to have been discovered by Conon the Samian), the radius of which increases uniformly with the angle; the hyperbolic spiral, whose radius vector is inversely proportional to the angle; the lituus, the square of whose radius vector is inversely proportional to the angle; and the logarithmic spiral, whose angle is proportional to the logarithm of the radius vector.

Archimedean Spiral.

Hyperbolic Spiral. (Less of the inner part of one branch is shown than of the other.)

2. A helix or curve which winds round a cylinder like a screw. —3. A spiral spring. —4. In wool, one of the curls or convolutions in wool-fiber, the number of which in a unit of length is made the basis of an estimate of its quality for manufacturing. —5. In zoöl. and anat., a spiral formation, as of a univalve, of the cochlea, etc. —Airy's spirals, the peculiar colored interference figures seen when two sections of quartz, one of a right-handed the other of a left-handed crystal, both cut transverse to the vertical axis, are placed one over the other, and viewed in converging polarized light. —Curschmann's spirals, in pathol., bodies formed of spirally wound mucous threads with often a fine shining central thread. They seem to be casts of small bronchi, and are expectorated in asthma and certain forms of bronchitis. —Double, equiangular, logarithmic, loxodromic spiral. See the adjectives. —Logistic spiral. Same as logarithmic spiral (which see, under logarithmic). —Norwich spiral, that second involute of the circle whose apse is midway between the cusp of the first involute and the center of the circle: so called because first shown by Sylvester at the meeting of the British Association at Norwich in 1868. —Parabolic spiral. See parabolic[2], and cut above.

spiral (spī′ral), v. t.; pret. and pp. spiraled, spiralled, ppr. spiraling, spiralling. [< spiral, n.] To make spiral; cause to move spirally.

The teeth of the cutter should be made to run slightly spiralled. Joshua Rose, Practical Machinist, p. 346.

spirality (spī-ral′i-ti), n. [< spiral + -ity.] Spiral character or quality. Science, III. 583.

spirally (spī′ral-i), adv. In the form or manner of a spiral.

spiral-tail (spī′ral-tāl), n. The royal or king bird of paradise, Cincinnurus regius: so called from the spiral coil at the end of the middle tail-feathers. See cut under Cincinnurus.

spiramentt, n. [< L. spiramentum, a breathing-hole, air-hole, < spirare, breathe: see spire[3].] A spiracle. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 78.

spirant (spī′rant), n. [< L. spiran(t-)s, ppr. of spirare, breathe, blow, exhale: see spire[3].] A consonant uttered with perceptible blowing, or expulsion of breath; an alphabetic sound in the utterance of which the organs are brought near together but not wholly closed; a rustling, or fricative, or continuable consonant. The term is by some restricted to sounds of the grade of v and f, the th of thin and that of thine, and the German ch; others make it include also the sibilants; others, the semivowels w and y.

Spiranthes (spī-ran′thēz), n. [NL. (Richard, 1818), so called in allusion to the spiral arrangement of the flowers; < Gr. σπεῖρα, a coil, spire, + ἄνθος, flower.] A genus of orchids, of the tribe Neottieæ, type of the subtribe Spiranthæ. It is characterized by commonly spirally ranked and somewhat ringent flowers with the upper sepal and the two petals erect or connivent and galeate, and the lateral sepals set obliquely on the ovary or long-decurrent, and by a column not prolonged into a free appendage, but usually decurrent on the ovary. There are about 80 species, widely dispersed through temperate and tropical regions of both hemispheres. They are terrestrial herbs from a short rootstock or a cluster of fleshy fibers or thickened tubers. Many species produce small white or greenish fragrant flowers, in several spirals forming a dense spike; in some the spike is reduced to a single spiral or becomes straight and unilateral. The flowers are commonly small, but reach a large size in some tropical American species. The leaves are usually narrow, often grass-like. Six species are natives of the northeastern United States, all late-flowering and some of them then leafless. They are known as lady's-tresses, S. cernua also locally as wild tuberose, and S. gracilis as corkscrew-plant.

spiranthic (spī-ran′thik), a. [< spiranth-y + -ic.] Of the nature of or affected with spiranthy.

spiranthy (spī-ran′thi), n. [< Gr. σπεῖρα, a coil, spire (see spire[2]), + ἄνθος, a flower.] In bot., the abnormal dislocation of the organs of a flower in a spiral direction. Thus, Masters describes a curious flower of Cypripedium insigne, in which a displacement occurred by a spiral torsion proceeding from right to left, which involved the complete or partial suppression of the organs of the flower. Also spelled speiranthy.

spiraster (spī-ras′tėr), n. [NL., < Gr. σπεῖρα, a coil, spire, + ἀστήρ, a star.] In sponges, an irregular polyact spicule in the form of a stout spiral with thick spines; a spinispirula. When these spines or rays are terminal, the spicule is called an amphiaster. Sollas.

Spirastrosa (spir-as-trō′sä), n. pl. [NL.: see spirastrose.] In Sollas's classification of sponges, a group of choristidan tetractinellidan sponges, generally provided with spirasters.

spirastrose (spī-ras′trōs), a. [< spiraster + -ose (see -ous).] Having microscleres or flesh-spicules in the form of spirasters; of or pertaining to the Spirastrosa: distinguished from sterrastrose.

spirated (spī′rā-ted), a. [< spire[2] + -ate[1] + -ed[2].] Formed into or like a spiral; twisted like a corkscrew. See cut under sasin. [Rare.]

The males of this species [Antilope bezoartica] have long, straight, spirated horns nearly parallel to each other, and directed backward. Darwin, Descent of Man, II. 235.

spiration (spī-rā′shon), n. [< LL. spiratio(n-), a breathing, < L. spirare, pp. spiratus, breathe, blow, exhale: see spire[3].] 1. A breathing.

God did by a kind of spiration produce them.
Barrow, Sermons, II. xxxiv.

2. In theol., the act by which the procession of the Holy Ghost is held to take place; also, the relation or notion so constituted.

spire[1] (spīr), n. [Also spear (formerly also speer), now commonly associated with spear[1]; < ME. spire, spyre, spir, < AS. spīr, a stalk, = MLG. spīr, LG. spier, a point, needle, sprout, = G. spier, a needle, pointer, spiere, a spar, = Icel. spīra, a spar, stilt, a kind of beaker, = Sw. spira, a spar, scepter, pistil, = Dan. spire, a spar, germ, shoot, spir, a spar, spire (in arch.); perhaps connected with spike[1] and spine, or with spear[1].] 1. A sprout or shoot of a plant.

An ook comth of a litel spire. Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 1335.

2. A stalk of grass or some similar plant; a spear.

Shal neuere spir springen vp.
Piers Plowman (C), xlii. 180.

Pointed Spires of Flax, when green,
Will Ink supply, and Letters mark unseen.
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

3. The continuation of the trunk in a more or less excurrent tree above the point where branching begins.

No tops to be received, except the spire and such other top or limb as may be grown on the main piece [British oak for navy contracts]. Laslett, Timber, p. 72.

4. A name of various tall grasses, as the marram, Ammophila arundinacea; the reed canary-grass, Phalaris arundinacea; and the common reed, Phragmites communis. Britten and Holland, Eng. Plant Names. [Prov. Eng.] —5. In mining, the tube carrying the train to the charge in the blast-hole: so called from the spires of grass or rushes used for the purpose. Also called reed or rush. —6. A body that shoots up to a point; a tapering body; a conical or pyramidal body; specifically, in arch., the tapering part of a steeple rising above the tower; a steeple; the great pinnacle, often of wood covered with lead, frequently crowning the crossing of the nave in large churches. The earliest spires, in the architectural sense, were merely pyramidal or conical roofs, specimens of which exist in some of the oldest Romanesque buildings. These roofs, becoming gradually elongated and more and more acute, resulted at length in the graceful tapering spire. Among the many existing medieval examples, that of Salisbury Cathedral is one of the finest; that of Senlis Cathedral, France, though not of great size, is one of the earliest of fully developed spires, and is admired for the purity and elegance of its design. The spires of medieval architecture are generally square, octagonal, or circular in plan; they are sometimes solid, more frequently hollow, and are variously ornamented with bands encircling them, with panels more or less enriched, and with piercings and spire-lights, which are of infinite variety. Their angles are sometimes crocketed, and they are often terminated by a finial. In later examples the general pyramidal outline is obtained by diminishing the diameter of the structure in successive stages, and this has been imitated in modern spires, in which the forms and details of classic architecture have been applied to an architectural creation essentially medieval. The term spire is sometimes restricted to signify such tapering structures, crowning towers or turrets, as have parapets at their base, while when the spire rises from the exterior of the wall of the tower, without the intervention of a parapet, it is called a broach. See also cuts under broach, 10, rood-steeple, and transept.

Spire of Senlis Cathedral, France; early 13th century.

The glorious temple rear'd
Her pile, far off appearing like a mount
Of alabaster, topt with golden spires.
Milton, P. R., iv. 548.

7. The top or uppermost point of a thing; the summit.

To silence that
Which, to the spire and top of praises vouch'd, Would seem but modest. Shak., Cor., i. 9. 24.

spire[1] (spīr), v.; pret. and pp. spired, ppr. spiring. [< ME. spiren, spyren (= Dan. spire = Sw. spira, germinate); < spire[1], n.] I. intrans. 1. To sprout, as grain in malting. —2. To shoot; shoot up sharply.

Yon cypress spiring high,
With pine and cedar spreading wide
Their darksome boughs on either side.
Wordsworth, White Doe of Rylstone, iv.

II. trans. 1†. To shoot or send forth.

In gentle Ladies breste and bountaous race
Of woman kind it fayrest Flowre doth spyre.
Spenser, F. Q., III. v. 52.

2. To furnish with a spire or spires.

Like rampired walls the houses lean,
All spired and domed and turreted,
Sheer to the valley's darkling green.
W. E. Henley, From a Window in Princes Street.

spire[2] (spīr), n. [< F. spire = Sp. Pg. espira = It. spira, < L. spira, < Gr. σπεῖρα, a coil, twist, wreath, spire, also a tore or anchor-ring. Cf. Gr. σπυρίς, a woven basket, L. sporta, a woven basket, Lith. spartas, a band. Hence spiral, etc.] 1. A winding line like the thread of a screw; anything wreathed or contorted; a coil; a curl; a twist; a wreath; a spiral.

His head . . .
With burnish'd neck of verdant gold erect Amidst his circling spires, that on the grass Floated redundant. Milton, P. L., ix. 502.

2. In conch., all the whorls of a spiral univalve above the aperture or the body-whorl, taken together as forming a turret. In most cases the spire is exserted from the last turn of the shell, giving the ordinary turreted conical or helicoid form of numberless gastropods; and in some long slender forms, of many turns and with small aperture, the spire makes most of the length of the shell, as figured at Cerithium, Cylindrella, and Terebra, for example. In other cases, however, the spire scarcely protrudes from the body-whorl, and it may be even entirely included or contained in the latter, so that a depression or other formation occupies the usual position of the apex of the shell. (Compare cuts under cowry, Cypræa, Cymbium, and Ovulum.) See also cut under univalve.

a, Spire of a Univalve (Imbricaria conica).

3. In math., a point at which different leaves of a Riemann's surface are connected. Also called a spiral point.

spire[3]† (spīr), v. i. [= OF. spirer, espirer, esperer = Sp. Pg. espirar = It. spirare, < L. spirare, breathe. Hence ult. spirit, etc., and aspire, conspire, expire, inspire, perspire, respire, transpire.] To breathe.

But see, a happy Borean blast did spire
From faire Pelorus parts, which brought us right.
Vicars, tr. of Virgil (1632). (Nares.)

spire[4]†, r. A Middle English form of speer[1].

spire[5] (spīr), n. [Cf. spire[1].] The male of the red deer, Cervus elaphus, in its third year.

A spire [has] brow [antler] and uprights.
W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 510.

spire-bearer (spīr'bār'ėr), n. In conch., a spirifer.

spired[1] (spīrd), a. [< spire[1] + -ed[2].] Having a spire.

And Baal's spired Stone to Dust was ground.
Cowley, Davideis, ii.

spired[2] (spīrd), a. [< spire[2] + -ed[2].] In conch., having a spire, as a univalve shell; spirifcrous; turreted.

spire-light (spīr'līt), n. A window or opening of any kiud for light in a spire.

spire-steeple (spīr'stē pl), n. A spire considered as part of a steeple; a spire. [Rare.]

spiric (spī'rik), a. and n. [< Gr. σπειρικός, spirie, < σπεῖρα, a tore, < σπείρειν, sweep round.] I. a. Pertaining to or in the form of a tore or anchor-ring.—Spiric body, a tore.—Spiric line. See line[2].

II. n. A curve, the plane section of a tore. Such curves, which are bicircular quartics, were treated by the ancient geometers Eudoxus and Perseus.

spiricle (spir'i-kl), n. [< NL. spiricula*, dim. of L. spira, a spire: see spire[2].] In bot., one of the delicate coiled threads in the hairs on the surface of certain seeds and achenes, which uncoil when wet. They probably serve in fixing small and light seeds to the soil, in order that they may germinate.

Spirifer (spir'i-fėr), n. [NL. (Sowerby, 1816), < L. spira, a coil, spire, + ferre = E. bear[1].] 1. The typical genus of Spiriferidæ, having the long brachial appendages coiled into a pair of a, ventral view; b, dorsal view; c, lateral view.

spirals, called the carriage-spring apparatus, supported upon similarly convoluted shelly lamellæ, and the shell impunctate, with a long straight hinge-line. Numerous species range from the Lower Silurian to the Permian. S. hysterica is an example. Also called Spirifera, Spiriferus.

2. [l. c.] A member of this genus.

Spiriferidæ (spir-i-fer'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spirifer + -idæ.] A family of arthropomatous brachiopods with highly developed spiral appendages, typified by the genus Spirifer, containing numerous genera, ranging from the Lower Silurian to the Liassic.

spiriferine (spī-rif'ė-rin), a. [< Spirifer + -ine[1].] Bearing brachial appendages in the form of a spiral; of or pertaining to the Spiriferidæ.

spiriferoid (spī-rif'ė-roid), n. and a. [< Spirifer + -oid.] I. n. A brachiopod of the family Spiriferidæ.

II. a. Resembling a spirifer; having characters of the Spiriferidæ.

spiriferous (spī-rif'ė-rus), a. [< NL. spirifer*, < L. spira, a coil, spire, + ferre = E. bear[1].] 1. Having a spire, as a univalved shell; spired; turreted.—2. Having spiral appendages, as a brachiopod; spiriferine.—3. Containing or yielding fossil spirifers, as a geological stratum. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 507.

spirignath (spir'ig-nath), n. [< NL. spirignatha (Latreille, 1796), < spirignathus*: see spirignathous.] The slender spirally coiled antlia or haustellum of lepidopterous insects. Also spirignatha, spiritrompe.

spirignathous (spī-rig'nā-thus), a. [< NL. spirignathus*, < Gr. σπεῖρα, a coil, + γναθός, a jaw.] Having a filiform sucking-tube coiled in a spiral, as a moth or butterfly; haustellate or antliate, as a lepidopterous insect.

spirillar (spir'i-lăr), a. [< Spirill-um + -ar[3].] In bot., belonging to or resembling the genus Spirillum.

Spirillum (spī-ril'um), n. [NL. (Ehrenberg, 1830), dim. of L. spira, a coil, spire: see spire[2].] A genus or form-genus of Schizomycetes or bacteria, having cylindrical or somewhat compressed spirally twisted cells. They are rigid and furnished at each end with a cilium, and multiply by transverse division, the parts soon separating from one another. This genus, which according to some authorities also embraces the genus known as Vibrio, contains many species, found in swamp-water, salt water, infusions, etc. See Schizomycetes.—Spirillum fever. See fever[1].

spirit (spir'it), n. [< ME. spirit, spirite, spyryte, spyrite (also sprit, sprite, > E. sprite[1]), < OF. espirit, esperit, esprit, F. esprit = Sp. espíritu = Pg. espirito = It. spirito, spirit (= G. Sw. Dan. spiritus, spirits of wine, etc.), < L. spiritus, a breathing or blowing (as of the wind), a breeze, the air, a breath, exhalation, the breath of life, life, mind, soul, spirit, also courage, haughtiness, etc., LL. a spirit, ghost, < spirare, breathe: see spire[3]. Cf. sprite[1], a doublet of spirit.] 1. According to old and primitive modes of thought, an invisible corporeal thing of an airy nature, scarcely material, the principle of life, mediating between soul and body. The primitive and natural notion of life was that it consisted of the breath, and in most languages words etymologically signifying 'breath' are used to mean the principle of life. Spirit is one of these, and translates the Greek πνεῦμα. The ordinary notion of the Greek philosophers was that the soul is warm air. This was strengthened by the discovery, about the time of Aristotle (who, however, does not share the opinion), of the distinction between the veins and the arteries. It is found elaborately developed in the writings of the Stoics, and especially of Galen. The spirit in the body exists in various degrees of fineness. The coarser kinds confer only vegetative life, and betray themselves in eructations, etc.; there are, besides, a vital spirit (πνεῦμα ζωτικόν) and an animal or psychical spirit (πνεῦμα ψυχικόν). At birth man was said to possess only vegetative spirit, but as soon as he draws breath this was thought to be carried through the left ventricle and the arteries to every part of the body, becoming triturated, and conveying animal life to the whole. The spirits were also said to be in different states of tension or tone, causing greater or less energy of body and mind. The vital spirits, being carried to the ventricles of the brain, were there further refined, and converted into spirits of sense, or animal spirits. In vision these spirits dart out from the eye to the object, though this be the most distant star, and immediately return laden in some form with information. This doctrine, modified by the addition of an incorporeal soul, and confused with the Hebrew conception of a spirit, was generally believed down to and into the scientific era. Old writers, therefore, who use phrases which are still employed metaphorically must be understood as meaning them literally. See def. 3.

There is no malice in this burning coal;
The breath of heaven hath blown his spirit out.
Shak., K. John, iv. 1. 110.

From the kind heat which in the heart doth raigne
The spirits of life doe their beginning take;
These spirits of life, ascending to the braine,
When they come there the spirits of sense do make.

These spirits of sense in fantasie's high court
Judge of the formes of objects ill or well;
And so they send a good or ill report
Downe to the heart, where all affections dwell.

Besides, another motive power doth rise
Out of the heart, from whose pure blood do spring
The vitall spirits, which, borne in arteries, Continuall motion to all parts doe bring.
Sir J. Davies, Nosce Teipsum.

Adam, now enforced to close his eyes,
Sunk down, and all his spirits became entranced.
Milton, P. L., xi. 419.

Thus much cannot be denied, that our soul acteth not immediately only upon bones, flesh, brains, and other such like gross parts of the body, but, first and chiefly, upon the animal spirits, as the immediate instruments of sense and fancy, as that by whose vigour and activity the other heavy and unwieldy bulk of the body is so nimbly moved. And therefore we know no reason why we may not assent here to that of Porphyrius: that the blood is the food and nourishment of the spirit, and that this spirit is the vehicle of the soul, or the more immediate seat of life.
Cudworth, Intellectual System, v. § 3.

2. The principle of life conceived as a fragment of the divine essence breathed into man by God. This conception is developed in the Old and New Testaments, in the writings of the Neoplatonists, and by theologians. In Biblical and theological language the spirit is the highest part of human nature, as most akin to the divine, connected mediately with the body through the soul, and spoken of alone, or in contradistinction to the body, or as distinguished from both body and soul (see soul).

All flesh died that moved upon the earth, . . . all in whose nostrils was the breath of the spirit of life.
Gen. vii. 21, 22.

The spirit of Elijah doth rest on Elisha. 2 Ki. ii. 15.

My spirit is consumed, my days are extinct, the grave is ready for me. Job xvii. 1.

Who among men knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of the man, which is in him? 1 Cor. ii. 11 [R. V.].

Our body shall be turned into ashes, and our spirit shall vanish as the soft air. Wisdom of Solomon, ii. 3.

3. Metaphorically, animation; vivacity; exuberance of life; cheerfulness; courage; mettle; temper; humor; mood: usually in the plural. But in old writers this meaning is not figurative, since they conceived this quality to be due to the tension of animal spirits.

So feble were his spirites, and so low,
Chaucer, C. T., l. 1361.

Hastings went to the council that morning in remarkably high spirits. J. Gairdner, Rich. III., ii.

All furnish'd, all in arms; . . .
As full of spirit as the month of May.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iv. 1. 101.

I wonder you can have such spirits under so many distresses. Sheridan, School for Scandal, iv. 1.

4. A peculiar animating and inspiring principle; dominant influence; genius; that which pervades and tempers the conduct and thought of men, either singly or (especially) in bodies, and characterizes them or their works.

O spirit of love! how quick and fresh art thou!
Shak., T. N., i. 1. 9.

This shows plainly the democratical spirit which acts our deputies. Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 141.

All seem to feel the spirit of the place,
And by the general reverence God is praised.
Wordsworth, Sonnets, iii. 48.

That is the best part of each writer which has nothing private in it; . . . that which in the study of a single artist you might not easily find, but in the study of many you would abstract as the spirit of them all.
Emerson, Compensation.

And that law of force which governs all the changes of character in a given people at a given time, which we call the Spirit of the Age, this also changes, though more slowly still. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 80.

5. The essence, real meaning, or intent of any statement, command, or contract: opposed to letter.

Who also hath made us able ministers of the new testament; not of the letter, but of the spirit: for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life. 2 Cor. iii. 6.

The scientific principles of Aristotle were in spirit, if not in form, in contrast with those of modern science.
W. Wallace, Epicureanism, p. 171.

6. Incorporeal, immaterial being or principle; personality, or a personality, unconnected or only associated with a body: in Biblical use applied to God, and specifically [cap.] to the third person of the Trinity (the Holy Spirit); also to supernatural good and evil beings (angels).

God is a spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth. John iv. 24.

But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. 1 Cor. ii. 10.

Putting together the ideas of thinking and willing, or the power of moving or quieting corporeal motion, joined to substance, of which we have no distinct idea, we have the idea of an immaterial spirit.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxiii. 15.

If we seclude space out of our consideration, there will remain but two sorts of substances in the world: that is, matter and mind; or, as we otherwise call them, body and spirit. Watts, Logic, I. ii. § 2.

Spirit exists everywhere in nature, and we know of no spirit outside of nature.
Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), II. 455.

7. A person considered with respect to his peculiar characteristics of mind or temper, especially as shown in action; a man of life, fire, energy, enterprise, courage, or the like, who influences or dominates: as, the leading spirits of the movement were arrested.

In its modern form, spiritualism originated in the State of New York in the year 1848, and since that time has extended over the United States and Europe. The mediums through whom the supposed communications take place are of various kinds, no fewer than twenty-four different classes being mentioned in the books explanatory of spiritualism. Among the chief methods of communication are rappings, table-tippings, writing, and speaking; in the latter forms of communication the medium is supposed to be fully possessed by the spirit for the time being. Spiritualism has no formal system of theology, and it is contended by many of its advocates that it is not necessarily inconsistent with the maintenance of a faith otherwise Christian, and that spirit-communications are providential interventions for the purpose of inculcating the doctrine of immortality, and counteracting the material tendencies of the age. The meetings for spiritualistic communications are commonly called séances. Also spiritism.

spiritualist (spir′i-tū-al-ist), n. [= F. spiritualiste = Sp. Pg. espiritualista = It. spiritualista; as spiritual + -ist.] 1. One who professes a regard for spiritual things only; also, one whose employment is spiritual.

May not he that lives in a small thatched house . . . preach as loud, and to as much purpose, as one of those high and mighty spiritualists?
Echard, Grounds of Contempt of Clergy (1696), p. 140. (Latham.)

2. One who accepts philosophical spiritualism. See spiritualism, 2.

We may, as spiritualists, try to explain our memory's failures and blunders by secondary causes.
W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 2.

3. One who believes that intercourse may be and is held with departed spirits, especially through the agency of a medium; one who claims to hold such intercourse. Also called spiritist.

spiritualistic (spir″i-tū-a-lis′tik), a. [< spiritualist + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to philosophic spiritualism; idealistic.

The deep-lying doctrine of Spiritual Beings, which embodies the very essence of Spiritualistic as opposed to Materialistic philosophy.
E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, I. 384.

2. Of or pertaining to modern spiritualism, or communication with departed spirits; produced by or believed to be due to the agency of departed spirits: as, spiritualistic manifestations; a spiritualistic séance.

spirituality (spir″i-tū-al′i-ti), n.; pl. spiritualities (-tiz). [< ME. spiritualite, spiritualte, < OF. spiritualite, spiritualte, espiritualte, esperituaute, etc., F. spiritualité = Sp. espiritualidad = Pg. espiritualidade = It. spiritualità, < LL. spiritualita(t-)s, < spiritualis, spiritual: see spiritual.] 1. Spiritual nature or character; immateriality; incorporeality.

A pleasure made for the soul, suitable to its spirituality, and equal to all its capacities. South.

2. Spiritual tendency or aspirations; freedom from worldliness and from attachment to the things of time and sense; spiritual tone; desire for spiritual good.

We are commanded to fast, that we may pray with more spirituality, and with repentance.
Jer. Taylor, Sermons, Return of Prayers, I.

No infidel can argue away the spirituality of the Christian religion; attacks upon miracles leave that unaffected.
De Quincey, Essenes, I.

His discourses were so valued, and his spirituality so revered, that his ministrations were coveted in all that region. New Princeton Rev., II. 140.

3†. The clergy as a whole; the ecclesiastics; the church.

Five entire subsidies were granted to the king by the spirituality. Fuller.

4. That which belongs to the church or to an ecclesiastic in his official capacity: generally in the plural, and distinguished from temporalities: as, spiritualities of a bishop (those profits and dues which a bishop receives in his ecclesiastical character).—Guardian of the spiritualities. See guardian.—Spirituality of benefices, the tithes of land, etc.

spiritualization (spir″i-tū-al-i-zā′shon), n. [< spiritualize + -ation.] 1. The act of spiritualizing, or the state of being spiritualized.—2. In old chem., the operation of extracting spirit from natural bodies.

Also spelled spiritualisation.

spiritualize (spir′i-tū-al-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. spiritualized, ppr. spiritualizing. [< F. spiritualiser = Sp. Pg. espiritualizar = It. spiritualizzare; as spiritual + -ize.] 1. To make spiritual, or more spiritual; elevate above what is worldly or bodily.

Unless we endeavour to spiritualise ourselves, . . . the older we grow the more we are embruted and debased.
Southey, The Doctor, clxxxiv.

2. To infuse spirituality or life into; inform with spirit or life; animate.

This seen in the clear air, and the whole spiritualized by endless recollections, fills the eye and the heart more forcibly than I can express. Carlyle. (Imp. Dict.)

3. To draw a spiritual meaning from, or impart a spiritual meaning to: as, to spiritualize a text of Scripture.—4. In chem.: (a) To extract spirit from. (b) To convert into spirit, or impart the properties of spirit to.

Also spelled spiritualise.

spiritualizer (spir′i-tū-al-ī-zėr), n. [< spiritualize + -er[1].] One who spiritualizes, in any sense. Also spelled spiritualiser.

The most licentious of the allegorists, or the wildest of the spiritualizers. Warburton, Divine Legation, ix. 2.

spiritually (spir′i-tū-al-i), adv. [< ME. spyritually; < spiritual + -ly[2].] 1. In a spiritual manner; without corporeal grossness, sensuality, or worldliness; with purity of spirit or heart.—2. As a spirit; ethereally.

The sky . . .
Bespangled with those isles of light,
So wildly, spiritually bright.
Byron, Siege of Corinth, xi.

3. In a spiritual sense.

spiritual-minded (spir′i-tū-al-mīn″ded), a. Having the mind set on spiritual things; having holy affections; spiritual.

spiritual-mindedness (spir′i-tū-al-mīn″dednes), n. The state of being spiritual-minded; spirituality of mind.

spiritualness (spir′i-tū-al-nes), n. The state or character of being spiritual; spirituality.

spiritualty† (spir′i-tū-al-ti), n. [< ME. spiritualte, < OF. speritualté, etc.: see spirituality.] The ecclesiastical body; the whole clergy of any national church.

It [the church] is abused and mistaken for a multitude of shaven, shorn, and oiled, which we now call the spiritualty and clergy.
Tyndale, Ans. to Sir T. More, etc. (Parker Soc., 1850), p. 12.

spirituelle (spir″i-tū-el′), a. [F., fem. of spirituel: see spiritual.] Characterized by or exhibiting a refined intellectuality, grace, or delicacy: noting primarily but not exclusively a woman or the ways of women.

I have the air of youth without freshness, but noble, sweet, lively, spirituelle, and interesting.
The Century, XL. 654.

spirituosity (spir″i-tū-os′i-ti), n. [< spirituous + -ity.] 1. Spirituous character or quality: as, the spirituosity of beer.—2. Immateriality; ethereality. Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 421.

spirituoso (spir″i-tū-ō′sō). adv. Same as spiritoso.

spirituous (spir′i-tū-us), a. [= Dan. spirituös; < OF. (and F.) spirituex = Pg. espirituoso, spirituous; cf. G. spirituosen, Sw. Dan. spirituosa, pl., alcoholic liquors; < ML. spirituosus*, full of spirit, < L. spiritus, spirit: see spirit; cf. spiritous.] 1†. Having the quality of spirit; ethereal; immaterial; intangible.—2†. Lively; active; gay; cheerful; enlivening.

> Hedon. Well, I am resolved what I'll do.
> Ana. What, my good spirituous spark?
> B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, iii. 2.

> That it may appear alery and spirituous, & fit for the welcome of chearful guests; the principal difficulty will be in contriving the lights and stair-cases.
> Sir H. Wotton, Reliquiæ, p. 42.

3. Containing much alcohol; distilled, whether pure or compounded, as distinguished from fermented; ardent: applied to a liquor for drinking.—Syn. 3. Spirituous, Spiritual, Spirited. Spirituous is now strictly confined to the meaning of alcoholic: as, spirituous, ardent, or intoxicating liquors. Spiritual is as strictly confined to that higher field of meaning which is opposed to corporeal or carnal, secular or temporal. Spirited expresses active animal spirits, or that spirit which is a vigorous movement of the feelings and the will: as, a spirited horse, boy, reply.

spirituousness (spir'i-tū-us-nes), n. The character of being spirituous. Boyle.

spiritus (spir'i-tus), n.; pl. spiritus. [L.: see spirit.] 1. A breathing; an aspirate.—2. In phar., spirit; any spirituous preparation: the officinal name of various spirits, specified by a qualifying term: as, spiritus vini Gallici, spirit of French wine (that is, brandy); spiritus ætheris compositus, compound spirit of ether.—Spiritus asper, a rough breathing; in Gr. gram., the mark (῾) placed over or before an initial vowel, or over the second letter of an initial diphthong, to indicate that it should be preceded by a sound like h in English: also placed over ρ when it is initial or is preceded by another ρ (ῤῥ).—Spiritus lenis, a soft or smooth breathing; in Gr. gram., the mark (᾽) denoting the absence of the rough breathing.

spiritweed (spir'it-wēd), n. Same as spiritleaf.

spirit-world (spir'it-wėrld), n. The world of disembodied spirits; Hades; the shades.

spirity (spir'i-ti), a. [< spirit + *-y*¹.] Full of spirit; spirited. [Scotch.]

spirivalve (spī'ri-valv), a. [< L. spira, a coil, spire, + valva, door (valve).] Having a spiral shell, as a univalve mollusk; spirally whorled, as a shell.

spirket (spėr'ket), n. [Origin obscure.] In shipbuilding, a space forward and aft between the floor-timbers. Hamersly.

spirketing, spirketting (spėr'ket-ing), n. [< spirket.] In ship-building, the strakes of plank worked between the lower sills of ports and waterways. Thearle, Naval Arch., § 209.

spirling (spėr'ling), n. Same as *sparling*¹.

Spirobranchia (spī-rō-brang'ki-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σπεῖρα, a coil, spire, + βράγχια, gills.] Same as Brachiopoda. Also Spirobranchiata.

spirobranchiate (spī-rō-brang'ki-āt), a. and n. [< NL. spirobranchiatus, < Gr. σπεῖρα, a coil, spire, + βράγχια, gills.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Spirobranchiata; brachiopod.

II. n. A brachiopod.

Spirochæta (spī-rō-kē'tä), n. [NL. (Ehrenberg, 1833), < Gr. σπεῖρα, a coil, spire, + χαίτη, a bristle.] A genus of Schizomycetes or bacteria, having the cells united in long slender threads which usually show narrow spiral windings. The filaments have the liveliest movements, and clearly propel themselves forward and back, but are also able to bend in various ways. S. plicatilis occurs among algæ in swamp-water; S. Obermeieri, found in the blood of those sick with recurrent fever, is the cause of the disease; S. Cohnii is found in the mucus of the teeth, and S. gigantea in sea-water. Also Spirochæte.

Spirochæta Obermeieri.

spirogonimium (spī″rō-gō-nim'i-um), n.; pl. spirogonimia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. σπεῖρα, a coil, spire, + NL. gonimium, q. v.] In bot., a gonimium similar to a hormogonimium, but not moniliform, with the syngonimia subglobose, smaller and more scattered, as in Omphalaria.

Spirogyra (spī-rō-jī'rä), n. [NL. (Link, 1833), so called with ref. to the spiral bands of chlorophyl in the cells; < Gr. σπεῖρα, a coil, spire, + γῦρος, a circle, ring.] A genus of fresh-water algæ, of the class Conjugatæ and order Zygnemaceæ. They are among the commonest of fresh-water algæ, forming dense bright-green masses, in both running and stagnant water, and have often a slimy feel, owing to the well-developed mucilaginous sheath in which each filament is enveloped. The cells have one to several parietal chlorophyl-bands spirally winding to the right. Conjugation is scalariform or lateral. There are about 40 species and very many varieties in the United States. They are popularly called frog-spit or frog-spittle. See frog-spit, and cuts under chlorophyl and conjugation, 4.

spirolet, spirol† (spī'rōl, -rol), n. [< OF. spirole, a small culverin.] A small culverin.

> Long pieces of artillery called basilisks, and smaller sized ones, known by the name of spirols.
> Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, i. 47.

spiroloculine (spī-rō-lok'ū-lin), a. Composed of spirally coiled loculi or chamberlets: specifically noting certain foraminifers. Amer. Jour. Sci., No. 160, p. 328.

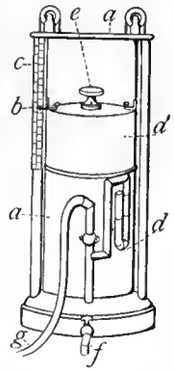
spirometer (spī-rom'e-tėr), n. [Irreg. < L. spirare, breathe (see *spire*³), + metrum, measure.] A contrivance for measuring the extreme differential capacity of the human lungs. The instrument most commonly employed consists of an inverted chamber submerged in a water-bath. The breath is conducted by a flexible pipe and internal tube so as to collect in the chamber, which rises in the water, and is fitted with an index which marks the cubic inches of air expired after a forced inspiration. In the accompanying cut, a a is a small gas-holder containing an inverted vessel a′; b, index, which shows on the scale c the number of cubic inches expired; d, manometer, which, when a′ is held down, shows the pressure which the lungs can exert; e, plug-vent for outlet of expired air; f, cock for outlet of water; g, tube through which the expiration is made.



Spirometer.

spirometric (spī-rō-met'rik), a. [As spirometer + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the spirometer; ascertained by means of the spirometer; as tested by the spirometer.—Spirometric capacity, extreme differential capacity of the lungs, measured by the total amount of air which can be expired after the fullest possible inspiration.

spirometry (spī-rom'e-tri), n. [As spirometer + *-y*³.] The use of the spirometer in measuring the capacity of the lungs.

Spiromonas (spī-rom'ō-nas), n. [NL. (Perty, 1852), < Gr. σπεῖρα, a coil, spire, + μονάς, a unit.] A genus of pantostomatous flagellate infusorians, spirally twisted on their long axis (whence the name). These animalcules are free-swimming or temporarily attached, soft and plastic, with two anterior subequal flagella, one of which is adherent at will. S. volubilis is an example. According to Kent, the Cyclidium distortum and Heteromita angustata of Dujardin are both species of Spiromonas.

spirophore (spī'rō-fōr), n. [Irreg. < L. spirare, breathe, + Gr. -φορος, < φέρειν = E. *bear*¹.] An apparatus for producing artificial respiration in cases of suspended animation, as in persons rescued from drowning. It consists of an air-tight case, in which the body is inclosed up to the neck, and an air-pump, for producing at proper intervals a partial vacuum in the case, thus causing the external air to fill the lungs of the patient.

Spirophyton (spī-rof'i-ton), n. [NL. (Hall), < Gr. σπεῖρα, a coil, spire, + φυτόν, a plant.] A genus of fossil algæ, a characteristic plant of a subdivision of the Devonian occurring in the State of New York, and called from this fossil (Spirophyton cauda-galli) the cauda galli grit. This alga belongs to a group which appeared early in the Silurian, and continued into the Tertiary, but is now extinct. The frond of Spirophyton was broad, thin, with a distinct transversal nervation, and spirally convoluted around a slender axis, the convolution widening with the distance from the point of attachment.

spirozooid (spī-rō-zō'oid), n. [< Gr. σπεῖρα, a coil, spire, + E. zooid.] The defensive zooid of certain hydroid hydrozoans, as of Podocoryne, a tubularian polyp: so called as coiling or curling spirally when not in action. These zooids are long slender filaments always provided with enidæ or lasso-cells for nettling, and are sometimes called spiralozooids. Compare dactylozooid and machopolyp.

Spirula lævis.

spirt¹, spirt². See *spurt*¹, *spurt*².

spirtle, v. and n. See spurtle.

Spirula (spir'ō-lä), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1799), < LL. spirula, dim. of L. spira, a coil, spire: see *spire*².] 1. In Cephalopoda: (a) A genus of sepioid cuttlefishes, typical of the family Spirulidæ, having a delicate shell in the hinder part of the body rolled into a flat or discoidal spiral, with discrete whorls whose involute spire presents ventrally, and no guard. There are several species, as S. lævis and S. fragilis. The shells are common, and are sometimes carried by the Gulf Stream to the coast of England, but specimens of the entire animal are extremely rare. Also Spirulæa, Spirulea. (b) [l. c.; pl. spirulæ (-lē).] A member of this genus. Imp. Dict.—2. [l. c.; pl. spirulæ (-lē).] In sponges, an irregular spineless polyact spicule of spiral form.

spirulate (spir'ō-lāt), a. [< LL. spirula, dim. of L. spira, a coil, spire (see Spirula), + *-ate*¹.] Spiral in form, or in disposition of parts; spirally arranged: said of structures, markings, etc.

Spirulidæ (spī-rō'li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spirula + -idæ.] A family of cephalopods, typified by the genus Spirula. They are squids or sepioids with the mantle supported by a cartilaginous prominence or ridge and a corresponding pit or furrow, the fins small and terminal, and an internal tubular shell partitioned into numerous chambers by transverse septa, and wound in a loose coil.

spirulite (spir'ō-līt), n. [< NL. Spirula + *-ite*².] A fossil cephalopod resembling or related to Spirula.

spiry¹ (spīr'i), a. [Early mod. E. spirie; < *spire*¹ + *-y*¹.] 1. Having the form of a spire or pyramid; tapering like a spire.

> In these lone walls (their days' eternal bound)
> Those moss-grown domes with spiry turrets crown'd.
> Pope, Eloisa to Abelard, l. 142.

2. Abounding in spires or steeples.

> And villages embosom'd soft in trees,
> And spiry towns by surging columns mark'd
> Of household smoke. Thomson, Spring, l. 953.

spiry² (spīr'i), a. [< *spire*² + *-y*¹.] Of a spiral form; spiral; wreathed; curled.

> Hid in the spiry volumes of the snake.
> Dryden, State of Innocence, iv. 2. spisciousf, a. A variant of spissous.

spissf (spis), a. [= OF. espais, espois, F. épais = Sp. espeso = Pg. espesso = It. spesso, < L. spissus, thick, compact, dense.] Thick; close; dense.

> This spiss and dense, yet polish'd, this copious, yet concise treatise of the variety of languages. Brerewood.

spissated (spis'ā-ted), a. [< L. spissatus, pp. of spissare, thicken, condense, < spissus, thick, compact: see spiss.] Inspissated; thickened, as by evaporation. Warburton, Divine Legation, ii. 4.

spissed† (spist), a. [< spiss + *-ed*².] Thickened; condensed; inspissated.

> Of such a spissed Substance there 's no need.
> Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 214.

spissitude (spis'i-tūd), n. [< L. spissitudo, thickness, density, < spissus, thick, compact: see spiss.] Density; the denseness or compactness which belongs to substances not perfectly liquid nor perfectly solid; inspissated condition.

> From this Grossness and Spissitude of Air proceeds the slow Nature of the Inhabitants. Howell, Letters, I. i. 8.

spissous† (spis'us), a. [< L. spissus, thick: see spiss.] Thick. Hist. of Francion (1655). (Nares.) spit¹ (spit), n. [(a) < ME. spitte, spytte, spette*, earlier spite, spyte, spete, < AS. spitu, a spit, = MD. spit, spet, speet, spete, D. spit = MLG. spit, LG. spitt = OHG. MHG. spiz, G. spiess (= Dan. spid = Sw. spett, < LG. ?), a roasting-spit, in G. also the branches of a deer's horn (hence OF. espoit, espoi, a spit, espois, F. épois, a deer's horn, = Sp. Pg. espeto, a spit, = Olt. spito, spedo, a spit); orig. neut. of the adj., OHG. spizzi, MHG. spitze, spiz, G. spitz, pointed (G. spitze, a point). (b) Cf. LG. speet (prop. spiet*), a spear, in humorous use a sword, = OHG. spioz, MHG. spiez, G. spiess, a spear, lance, pike, = Icel. spjōt, a spear, = Sw. spjut = Dan. spyd, a spear (hence OF. espiet, espet, espie, also espoit, espoi = It. spiedo, spiede, a spear). (c) Cf. Icel. spýta, a spit, a wooden peg, < spjōt, a spear. The above forms have been partly confused with one another. (d) Cf. W. pid, a tapering point.] 1. A slender bar, sharply pointed at the end, to be thrust through meat which is to be roasted in front of the fire. The rotation of the spit brings all parts of the meat in turn to the heat. The ordinary spit is several feet long, and rests on supports at the sides of the fireplace. Shorter spits are used for small birds, kidneys, etc. See cut under spit-rack.

> With your arms crossed on your thin-belly doublet like a rabbit on a spit. Shak., L. L. L., iii. 1. 20.

> He loves roast well
> That eats the spit.
> Fletcher, Mad Lover, ii. 1.

2†. A sword. [Cant.]

> Going naked with a spit on his shoulder.
> Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 309.

3†. The obelisk or dagger (†) used as a reference-mark.

> Either your starres or your spits (that I may use Origen's notes) shall be welcome to my margent.
> Bp. Hall, To Hugh Cholmley. (Latham.)

4. A small point of land running into the sea, or a long narrow shoal extending from the shore into the sea.

> But Hermod rode with Niord, whom he took
> To show him spits and beaches of the sea.
> M. Arnold, Balder Dead, iii.

> On a narrow spit of sand between the rocks a dozen little girls are laughing, romping, and pattering about.
> Kingsley, Two Years Ago, ii.

5. In weaving, the spindle or wire which holds the cop, spool, or pirn in the shuttle.

spit[1] (spit), v.; pret. and pp. spitted, ppr. spitting. [< ME. spitten, spyten, spitien = MD. spiten, speten, D. speten = MLG. LG. speten = OHG. spizzen, G. spiessen = Dan. spidde (cf. Sp. Pg. espetar), spit, turn on a spit; from the noun.] I. trans. 1. To thrust a spit through; pierce, transfix, or impale with or as with a spit: as, to spit a loin of veal.

> Look to see . . .
> Your naked infants spitted upon pikes.
> Shak., Hen. V., iii. 3. 38.

> How lov'd Patroclus with Achilles joins,

(a) That genus of painted finches of which the common indigo-bird of the United States is the type: synonymous with Passerina or Hortulanus of Vieillot, and Cyanospiza of Baird. See cut under indigo-bird. (b) Now employed for the silk-buntings, of which the common dickcissel or black-throated hunting, S. americana, is the type: synonymous with Dickcissel (Spiza americana).

Euspiza. The male is 6¾ inches long, 10¾ in extent of wings; the plumage is smooth and compact; the upper parts are grayish-brown, streaked with black on the back; the lower are whitish, shaded with gray, tinged with bright yellow on the breast, and marked with a large black throat-patch; the edge of the wing is yellow; the lesser and middle coverts are bright-chestnut; the lower eyelid is white, the superciliary stripe yellow, and the bill dark horn-blue. The female is similar, but plainer, being less tinged with yellow, and having no black throat-patch, but a few black maxillary or pectoral streaks. This bunting is widely but irregularly distributed in the United States, especially in the eastern half, abounding in some districts, but seldom or never seen in others apparently as eligible. It nests on the ground or in a low bush, and lays four or five plain pale-greenish eggs (rarely speckled). The nuptial male has a quaint monotonous ditty, three notes of which are rendered in the name dickcissel—a word which originated in Illinois, and crept into print in or about 1876.

Spizaëtus (spī-zā'e-tus), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), < Gr. σπίζα, a finch (see Spiza), + ἀετός, an eagle.] A genus of Falconidæ, including hawks or small eagles having the feet feathered to the bases of the toes, the tail square or little rounded, the wings short and rounded, and the head, in the typical species, with a long occipital crest. The genus is sometimes restricted to such birds as the crested eagle of Brazil, S. manduyti or S. ornatus; in a wider sense, it includes 12 or more species of Central and South America, Africa, India and the Indo-Malayan region, Celebes, Formosa, and Japan. Also Spizaëtos.

Spizella (spī-zel'ä), n. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1832), < Spiza + dim. -ella.] A genus of small American finches or sparrows, the chipping-sparrows, having the wings pointed, the tail long and emarginate, the back streaked, and the under parts not streaked in the adult. It includes several of the most familiar sparrows of the United States, as the chippy or chip-bird, S. socialis or domestica; the field-sparrow, S. agrestis or pusilla; the tree-sparrow, S. monticola; the clay-colored bunting and Brewer's bunting, S. pallida and S. breweri; and the black-chinned sparrow, S. atrigularis. See cut under field-sparrow.

Spizellinæ (spī-ze-lī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Spizella + -inæ.] A subfamily of Fringillidæ, containing a large number of small spotted and streaked sparrows. None of those which occur in the United States have any red, blue, or orange colors. S. F. Baird, 1858.

spizelline (spī-zel'in), a. [< Spizella + -ine[1].] Resembling or related to the chipping-sparrow; of or pertaining to the Spizellinæ.

splanchnology (splangk-nol'ō̤-ji), n. [< Gr. σπλάγχνον, pl. σπλάγχνα, viscera, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The sum of scientific knowledge concerning viscera.

splanchnopleura (splangk-nō̤-plö'rä), n.; pl. splanchnopleuræ (-rē). [NL.: see splanchnopleure.] Same as splanchnopleure.

splanchnopleural (splangk-nō̤-plö'ral), a. [< splanchnopleure + -al.] Forming the walls of viscera; constituting or pertaining to the splanchnopleure.

splanchnopleure (splangk'nō̤-plör), n. [< NL. splanchnopleura, < Gr. σπλάγχνον, pl. σπλάγχνα, viscera, + πλευρά, the side.] The inner or visceral layer of mesoderm, formed by the splitting of the mesoblast, separated from the somatopleure by the perivisceral space, cœlomatic cavity, or cœloma. It is formed in those animals whose germ becomes four-layered in the above manner, and then constitutes the musculature and connective tissue of the intestinal tract and its annexes—the lining epithelium being derived from the hypoblast. Thus, the connective tissue and muscular substance of the lungs, liver, kidneys, etc., and the thickness of the walls of the stomach, bowels, etc., are all splanchnopleural. The term is contrasted with somatopleure.

splanchnopleuric (splangk-nō̤-plö'rik), a. [< splanchnopleure + -ic.] Same as splanchnopleural. Foster, Elements of Embryology, i. 2.

splanchnoskeletal (splangk-nō̤-skel'e-tal), a. [< splanchnoskeleton + -al.] Skeletal or hard, as a part of a viscus; forming a part of, or relating to, the splanchnoskeleton.

splanchnoskeleton (splangk-nō̤-skel'e-tọn), n. [NL., < Gr. σπλάγχνα, pl. σπλάγχνα, viscera, + σκελετόν, skeleton.] The splanchnic or visceral skeleton; those hard parts of the body, collectively considered, which are developed in special relation with the viscera, and serve to support or contain them. Such are teeth, branchial arches, tracheal rings, bonelets of the eyeball and heart, penis-bones, etc. The term originated with Carus, 1828, and acquired currency through Owen and others. Its difference of meaning from sclereskeleton is not clear in all its applications.

splanchnotomical (splangk-nō̤-tom'i-kal), a. [< splanchnotom-y + -ic-al.] Anatomical in respect of the viscera; of or pertaining to splanchnotomy.

splanchnotomy (splangk-not'ō̤-mi), n. [< Gr. σπλάγχνον, pl. σπλάγχνα, viscera, + -τομία, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] Dissection of the viscera; the anatomy of the viscera: more commonly called visceral anatomy.

splash (splash), v. [A var. of plash[1], with unorig. s, regarded as intensive; perhaps suggested by the appar. relation of smash to mash[1].]

I. trans. 1. To spatter or bespatter, as with water, water and mud, or any other liquid.

In carving a partridge, I splashed her with gravy from head to foot. Sydney Smith, To Francis Jeffrey, 1806.

2. To dash or throw about in splotches: as, to splash dirty water on one.—3. To accomplish with splashing or plashing.

The stout, round-sterned little vessel ploughed and splashed its way up the Hudson, with great noise and little progress. Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 179.

Spliced eye. Same as eye-splice.—Splicing-clamp, a clamp used to hold the ends or parts to be spliced.—To splice the main-brace. See main-brace.

splice (splīs), n. [< splice, v.] 1. The joining together of two ropes or parts of a rope by interweaving part of the untwisted strands of each, or the union so effected. The short splice is used for a rope where it is not to pass through blocks. The long splice or round splice is made by unlaying the ends of ropes that are to be joined together and following the lay of one rope with a strand of the other until all the strands are used, and then neatly tucking the ends through the strands so that the size of the rope will not be changed. This occupies a great extent of rope, but by the three joinings being fixed at a distance from one another the increase of bulk is diminished, hence it is adapted to run through the sheave-hole of a block, etc. The eye-splice or ring-splice forms a sort of eye or circle at the end of a rope, and is used for splicing in thimbles, etc. See cut under eye-splice.

Splices of Ropes.
a, short splice; b, long splice; c, eye-splice.

8. In spoil-five, a drawn game.—Spoils system, in politics, the practice of treating the public offices not as public trusts, to be administered primarily for the public interest, but as spoils of war, to be taken from members of the defeated party and given to members of the successful party—the emoluments and distinction of holding such offices being regarded as rewards for services rendered to the successful party, and the influence resulting from the possession of the offices being expected to be used for the maintenance of that party in power: a term of depreciation. The name is derived from a remark made in a speech in the United States Senate, in January, 1832, by Mr. Marcy of New York; speaking of and for the New York politicians, he said, "They see nothing wrong in the rule that to the victor belong the spoils of the enemy." This system had previously attained great power in the State of New York; under Jackson's administration it prevailed in national politics, and was soon adopted by nearly all parties, and applied to local as well as State and national offices.—To shoot to spoil. See shoot.—Syn. 1. Plunder, Booty, etc. See pillage, n.

spoil (spoil), v.; pret. and pp. spoiled or spoilt, ppr. spoiling. [Early mod. L. spondere, answer: see sponsor.] In anc. pros., a foot consisting of two long times or syllables, one of which constitutes the thesis and the other the arsis: it is accordingly tetrasemic and isorrhythmic. The spondee is principally used as a substitute for a dactyl or an anapest. In the former case it is a dactylic spondee (– – for – ⏑ ⏑), in the latter an anapestic spondee (– – for ⏑ ⏑ –). An irrational spondee represents a trisemic foot, trochee, or iambus (– ⏑ for – ⏑, or ⏑ – for ⏑ –). It is found in the even places of trochaic lines and in the odd places of iambic lines, also in logaœdic verses, especially as representing the initial trochee ("basis"). A foot consisting of two spondees is called a dispondee.— Double spondee, greater spondee, in anc. pros., a foot consisting of two tetrasemic longs (– – – –), and accordingly double the magnitude of an ordinary (single) spondee (– –).

Spondiaceæ (spon-di-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Kunth, 1824), < Spondias + -aceæ.] Same as Spondieæ.

Spondias (spon′di-as), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < Gr. σπονδιάς, a false reading of σποδιάς, a tree supposed to be the bullace.] A genus of polypetalous trees, of the order Anacardiaceæ, type of the tribe Spondieæ. It is characterized by polygamous flowers with eight or ten stamens and four or five styles which are free at the apex. There are 5 species, dispersed through tropical regions of both hemispheres. They bear alternate odd-pinnate leaves, often crowded at the ends of the branches, with opposite and often very taper-pointed leaflets. The small short-pedicelled flowers form spreading terminal panicles. Each flower contains four or five spreading petals and a free ovary of as many cells, which becomes in fruit a fleshy drupe with a thick stone. The leaves and bark often yield medicinal and principally astringent preparations; the fruit is often austere and laxative; that of S. tuberosa is valued in Brazil as a remedy in fevers. The fruits of several species are known as hog-plums. S. purpurea, the purple or Spanish plum, is often cultivated in the West Indies, and is readily propagated by cuttings. S. lutea, a tree resembling the ash and reaching 40 or 50 feet, bears yellowish flower-buds, used as a sweetmeat with sugar, and a yellow oval fruit known as Jamaica plum or golden apple. S. dulcis, a similar tree abundant in most Polynesian islands, and known as Otaheite apple, yields a large yellow fruit with the smell of apples and an agreeable acid flavor, to the eye contrasting handsomely with the dark-green foliage. The tree is widely cultivated elsewhere in the tropics. A Brazilian tree, reported as S. tuberosa, produces long aërial roots which descend and form at the ground large black hollow and cellular tubers containing about a pint of water, supplying in dry weather the needs both of the tree and of travelers. S. mangifera of India is the source of a gum resembling gum arabic, known as hog-gum, and of several medicinal remedies. Its smooth yellowish-green fruit is known as wild mango, or amra, and is eaten parboiled or pickled or made into curries.

Spondieæ (spon-dī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1862), < Spondias + -eæ.] A tribe of polypetalous plants, of the order Anacardiaceæ, distinguished from the other tribe, Mangifericæ, by an ovary with from two to five cells (instead of one), the ovules usually or always pendulous. It includes 47 genera, of which Spondias is the type. They are mainly tropical or South African, and are mostly trees with pinnate leaves. Also Spondiaceæ, Spondieæ.

spondilt, n. An obsolete spelling of spondyl.

spondulics (spon-dū′liks), n. [Also spondoolics, spondoolix; origin obscure.] Originally, paper money; now, any money; funds. [Slang, U. S.]

spondyl, spondyle (spon′dil), n. [Formerly also spondil, spondal, spondle; < F. spondyle, < L. spondylus, < Gr. σπόνδυλος, less correct form of σφόνδυλος, a joint of the spine, a vertebra, joint, round stone, etc.] 1. A joint, or joining of two pieces.

Great Sir, the circles of the divine providence turn themselves upon the affairs of the world so that every spondyl of the wheels may mark out those virtues which we are then to exercise. Jer. Taylor, Ductor Dubitantium, Ded.

2. A joint of the backbone; a vertebra.

A kind of rack
Runs down along the spondils of his back.
B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd, ii. 2.

spondylalgia (spon-di-lal′ji-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + ἄλγος, pain.] Pain in the spine; rachialgia.

spondylarthritis (spon″di-lär-thrī′tis), n. [NL., < Gr. σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + NL. arthritis, q. v.] Inflammation of the vertebral articulations.

spondylexarthrosis (spon-di-leks-är-thrō′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + ἐξάρθρωσις, dislocation, < ἐξ, out, + ἄρθρον, a joint.] Dislocation of the vertebræ.

Spondylidæ[1] (spon-dil′i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1826), < Spondylus + -idæ.] A family of marine bivalves, related to the Limidæ and to the scallops, typified by the genus Spondylus; the thorn-oysters. The valves are dissimilar, the right one being the larger, and attached at the beak, the left generally flat or concave; the ligament is internal. About 70 species are known, inhabiting chiefly tropical seas. The extinct species are numerous. Formerly also Spondylea. See cut under Spondylus.

Spondylidæ[2] (spon-dil′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spondylis + -idæ.] In entom., a family of phytophagous coleopterous insects, typified by the genus Spondylis, having deeply impressed sensitive surfaces of the antennæ, and the tarsi not dilated. The family was erected by Le Conte and Horn to receive all the aberrant Cerambycidæ of Lacordaire, probably representing in the modern fauna remnants of the undifferentiated types of a former geologic age. The genera and species are few. Also Spondylii.

Spondylis (spon′di-lis), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1775), < Gr. σπόνδυλος, σφόνδυλος, a vertebra, joint: see spondyl.] A genus of phytophagous beetles, typical of the family Spondylidæ.

spondylitis (spon-di-lī′tis), n. [NL., < Gr. σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + -itis.] Arthritis of a vertebra.— Spondylitis deformans, arthritis deformans involving the vertebræ.

spondylolisthesis (spon-di-lol-is-thē′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + ὀλίσθησις, a slipping, < ὀλισθάνειν, slip, < ὄλισθος, slipperiness.] A displacement forward of the last lumbar vertebra on the sacrum.

spondylolisthetic (spon-di-lol-is-thet′ik), a. [< spondylolisthesis (-et-) + -ic.] Pertaining to, of the nature of, or affected with spondylolisthesis.

spondylopathia (spon″di-lō-path′i-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + πάθος, suffering.] Disease of the vertebræ.

spondylous (spon′di-lus), a. [< spondyl + -ous.] Of or pertaining to a spondyl; like a vertebra; vertebral.

Spondylus (spon′di-lus), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1758), < L. spondylus, < Gr. σπόνδυλος, σφόνδυλος, a vertebra, joint: see spondyl.] 1. A genus of bivalves, representing the family Spondylidæ, formerly referred to the Ostræidæ or Pectinidæ. They are remarkable for the character of their spines and the richness of their coloring. Some are known as thorn-oysters, spring-oysters, and water-clams.

Thorn-oyster (Spondylus princeps).

2. [l. c.] An oyster of this genus.—3. [l. c.] A vertebra.

sponet, n. A Middle English form of spoon[1].

spong (spong), n. [Prob. a form of spang, a clasp, brooch (taken as a point, a gore ?): see spang[1].] A projection of land; an irregular, narrow, projecting part of a field. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

The tribe of Judah with a narrow spong confined on the kingdom of Edom.
Fuller, Pisgah Sight, II. iv. 2. (Trench.)

sponge (spunj), n. [Formerly also spunge; < ME. sponge, spunge, spounge (= D. spongie, spons), < OF. esponge, F. éponge = Pr. esponja, esponga = Sp. Pg. esponja = It. spogna, spugna = AS. sponge = Gael. Ir. sponc, < L. spongia, < Gr. σπογγιά, also σπόγγος (Attic σφόγγος), a sponge, any spongy substance, = L. fungus, a mushroom, fungus; perhaps akin to Gr. σαμφός, spongy, porous, and to Dan. Sw. svamp, a sponge, fungus, = Icel. sveppr, a sponge, and so to Goth. swamms, a sponge, = OHG. swam, swamp, MHG. swam, swamp (swamb-), G. schwamm = MLG. swam, swamp, LG. swamm, swamp, a sponge, fungus: see swamp, and cf. spunk and fungus.] 1. A fixed aquatic organism of a low order, various in form and texture, composed of an aggregate of amœbiform bodies disposed about a common cavity provided with one or more inhalent and exhalent orifices (ostioles and oscules), through which water pours in and out. The proper sponge-substance is traversed by a water-vascular system or set of irrigating canals, and in nearly all cases is supported and strengthened by a skeleton in the form of horny fibers, or silicious or calcareous spicules. The streaming of the water is kept up by the vibration of cilia in the water-vascular system—that is, by the lashing of flagella borne upon the individual sponge-cells. These so much resemble flagellate infusorians that some naturalists regard sponges as compound infusorians, and consequently as protozoans. Those cells which have definite form are spindle-shaped, or flask-shaped, and provided with flagella, round the base of which there may be a little rim or collar, as in those infusorians known as collar-bearing monads, or Choanoflagellata. Sponges propagate by budding or gemmation, a process involving cell-fission or ordinary division of cells. They also reproduce sexually by ova and spermatozoa. Sponge-germs resulting from fission are called gemmules. The spermatozoa are spindle-shaped. The ova are like ordinary amœbiform cells, and are usually shed into the canals and pass out of the system to be developed; in some species they develop in the substance of the parent. The embryo forms a hollow ball with a ciliated cavity, and then acquires inhalent and exhalent pores. The living tissue proper of sponges is disposed in three layers or sets of cells, as in all higher animals. These are an ectoderm, cuticle, or out-layer; an endoderm, innermost layer, or in-layer; and a mesoderm, middle layer, or mid-layer, which may be quite thick. It is from the mid-layer that the reproductive elements, and all the many forms of skeletal elements, are derived. Special sense-organs have been described in some sponges. (See cut under synocil.) Sponges as a class or phylum of animals have many technical names—as Acnidophora, because they have no enidæ or stinging-organs (compare Cnidaria); Amorphozoa, from their shapelessness, or rather their many shapes; Parazoa, from their position with respect to both Protozoa and Metazoa; Porifera, Poriferata, Porozoa, and Polystomata, from their many pores or openings (see cut under Porifera); Spongiæ, Spongiaria, Spongida, Spongiozoa, etc. They are divided into various primary groups, the most tangible of which are two—the chalk-sponges, or Calcispongiæ, and the fibrous and flinty sponges, or Silicispongiæ. But the leading authorities differ irreconcilably in the arrangement and nomenclature of the many orders, families, and genera they respectively adopt; and the opinion has been expressed that the sponges are not susceptible of satisfactory treatment by the ordinary methods of zoölogical classification. See also cuts under ciliate, Spongilla, monadiform, Euplectella, and Hyalonemidæ.

Ascetta primordialis, one of the Chalk-sponges; a part of one side of the body removed, exposing the ventriculus.
o, osculum, mouth, or exhalent aperture; p, one of the many ostioles or inhalent pores; i, endoderm; e, ectoderm, in which triradiate spicules are embedded; g, ova.

2. The fibrous framework of a colony of sponge-animalcules, from which the animalcules themselves have been washed out, and from which the gritty or sandy parts of the colony, if there were any, have been taken away. See skeleton, 1 (b). The framework of sponges is of different characters in the several orders. The slime-sponges have none, or scarcely any. In the ordinary fibrous sponges the skeleton is a quantity of interlacing fibers and layers, forming an intricate network. This is further strengthened in the chalky and glassy sponges by hard spicules, either separately embedded in the general skeletal substance, called ceratode, or solidified in a kind of latticework. (See Calcispongiæ, Silicispongiæ.) The chalk-needles or calcareous spicules are either straight or oftener rayed in three-armed or four-armed crosses. The sand-needles or silicious spicules present an extraordinary and beautiful variety. Among them are many starry figures and wheel-like forms, resembling snow-crystals; others are still more curious, in the forms of crosses, anchors, grapnels, shirt-studs, bodkins, etc. The six-rayed star is the characteristic shape in the glass-sponges. (See Hexactinellida.) Sponge-spicules are named in an elaborate special vocabulary. (See sponge-spicule.) The glass-sponges have some commercial value from their beauty as objects of curiosity; but a few of the fibrous sponges are the only others out of many hundreds of species, both fossil and recent, of any economic importance. Sponges, when wetted, swell to a much greater size, and become very flexible; they are therefore used as vehicles and absorbents of water and other liquids, in wiping or cleansing surfaces, erasing marks, as from a slate, etc. See bath-sponge, Euspongia, and Hippospongia.

The Spounge, and the Reed, of the whiche the Jewes zaven oure Lord Eyselle and Galle, in the Cros.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 10.

3. Any sponge-like substance. (a) In baking, dough before it is kneaded and formed, when full of globules of carbonic acid generated by the yeast or leaven. (b) A metal when obtained in a finely divided condition, the particles having little coherence, and the mass more or less of a spongy texture. Thus, a "metallic sponge" of iron is obtained by the reduction of brown hematite ore by cementation with charcoal in the so-called "Chenot process" for the manufacture of steel. Spongy iron is also prepared on a large scale by the reduction of various ores, and in this form is used for purifying water. Platinum-sponge may be prepared by gently heating the double chlorid of platinum and ammonium. Platinum-black is a black powder not differing much in its properties from platinum-sponge, except that it is less dense; it may be made to take on the spongy character by repeated ignition in a mixture of air and a combustible gas: both are used as oxidizing agents.

4. A tool for cleaning a cannon after its discharge. The sponge used for smooth-bore guns consists of a cylinder of wood covered with sheepskin or some similar woolly fabric, and fitting the bore of the gun rather closely; this is secured to a long handle, or, for field-guns, to the reverse end of the rammer. For modern rifled guns and breech-loaders, sponges of different forms and materials have been introduced. A common form is a cylinder to which bristles are fixed, forming a cylindrical brush, the rounded end being also covered with the bristles. See cut under gun-carriage.

5. Figuratively, one who or that which absorbs without discrimination, and as readily gives up, when subjected to pressure, that which has been absorbed.—6. One who persistently lives upon others; a sycophantic or cringing dependent; a hanger-on for the sake of maintenance; a parasite.

Better a penurious Kingdom then where excessive wealth flowes into the gracelesse and injurious hands of common sponges to the impoverishing of good and loyall men.
Milton, Reformation in Eng., ii.

7. In the manège, the extremity or point of a horseshoe answering to the heel.—8. The coral, or mass of eggs, under the abdomen of a crab. [Chesapeake Bay.]—Bahama sponge, one of three species or varieties of bath-sponges procured from the Bahamas.—Burnt sponge, sponge that has been burnt, used in the treatment of goiter and scrofulous swellings.—Calcareous sponge, a chalk-sponge.—Crumb-of-bread sponge. See Halichondria.—Dog-head sponge, a kind of bath-sponge, Spongia agaricina punctata.—Fibrous sponge, any horny sponge.—Glove-sponge, a finger-sponge; a reef-sponge.—Hardhead sponge, a kind of bath-sponge, the hardhead, Spongia dura.—Holy sponge, in the Gr. Ch., a piece of compressed sponge which the deacon uses in the office of prothesis to gather together the portions in the disk under the holy bread, and with which he wipes the disk after communion.—Honeycomb sponge, the grass-sponge, Spongia equina cerebriformis.—Horny sponge, a fibrous or fibrosilicious sponge; a sponge of the group Ceratosa, as distinguished from a chalk-sponge or glass-sponge.—Pyrotechnical sponge. Same as amadou.—Red sponge, Microciona prolifera, the red beard of the oyster of the northern United States.—Reef-sponge, a kind of bath-sponge, Spongia officinalis, var. tubulifera, growing on the Florida reefs and in the West Indies.—Sheepswool sponge. See sheepswool.—Sponge tent. See tent.—Toilet-sponge, a bath-sponge of fine quality; a Turkish sponge.—To set a sponge, in baking, to leaven a small mass of dough, to be used in leavening a larger quantity.—To throw up the sponge, in pugilism, to toss up the sponge used to freshen a fighter, in acknowledgment of his defeat; hence, in general, to acknowledge that one is conquered or beaten; submit; give up the contest or struggle. [Slang.]—Turkey cup-sponge, Spongia adriatica.—Vegetable sponge. See sponge-gourd.—Velvet sponge, a fine soft sponge of the West Indies and Florida, Spongia equina, var. meandriformis.—Vitreous sponge, a glass-sponge.—Waxed sponge. Same as sponge tent.—Yellow sponge, zimocca sponge. See bath-sponge. (See also boring-sponge, cup-sponge, finger-sponge, flint-sponge, glass-sponge, grass-sponge, horse-sponge, wool-sponge.)

sponge (spunj), v.; pret. and pp. sponged, ppr. sponging. [Formerly also spunge; = D. sponsen = F. éponger = Sp. esponjar, sponge, < LL. spongiare, wipe off with a sponge; cf. Gr. σπογγίζειν, sponge; from the noun.] I. trans. 1. To cleanse or wipe with a sponge: as, to sponge the body; to sponge a slate or a cannon.

Brush thou, and spunge thy cloaths to,
That thou that day shalt weare.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 73.

2. To wipe out with a sponge, as letters or writing; efface; remove with a sponge; destroy all traces of: with out, off, etc.

Every little difference should not seem an intolerable blemish necessarily to be spunged out.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 19.

Specifically—3. To dampen, as in cloth-manufacturing.—4. To absorb; use a sponge, or act like a sponge, in absorbing: generally with up: as, to sponge up water that has been spilled.

They spunged up my money while it lasted, borrowed my coals and never paid for them, and cheated me when I played at cribbage.
Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xxvii.

5. To gain by sycophantic or mean arts.

Here wont the dean, when he 's to seek,
To sponge a breakfast once a week,
Swift, Richmond Lodge and Marble Hill.

"What else have you been spunging?" said Maria. . . . "Spunging, my dear! It is nothing but four of those beautiful pheasants' eggs, which Mrs. Whitaker would quite force upon me." Jane Austen, Mansfield Park, x.

6. To drain; harass by extortion; squeeze; plunder.

How came such multitudes of our own nation . . . to be spunged of their plate and money?
South, Sermons, I. xii.

7. In baking, to set a sponge for: as, to sponge bread.

II. intrans. 1. To gather sponges where they grow; dive or dredge for sponges.

There were a few small open boats engaged in sponging from Apalachicola, which were not entered upon the custom-house books. Fisheries of U. S., V. ii. 824.

2. To live meanly at the expense of others; obtain money or other aid in a mean way: with on.

She was perpetually plaguing and spunging on me.
Swift, To Dr. Sheridan, April 24, 1736.

sponge-animalcule (spunj'an-i-mal#kūl), n. A sponge-cell. See cut under monadiform.

sponge-bar (spunj'bär), n. A sand-bar or rock bottom on which sponges grow. [Florida.]

sponge-cake (spunj'kāk'), n. A very light sweet cake made of flour, eggs, and sugar, flavored with lemon: so called from its light, spongy substance.

sponge-crab (spunj'krab), n. A crab with which a sponge is habitually cancrisocial, as a member of the genus Dromia. See cut under Dromia.

sponge-cucumber (spunj'kū#kum-bėr), n. Same as sponge-gourd.

sponge-diver (spunj'dī#vėr), n. One who dives for sponges; a sponge-fisher.

sponge-farming (spunj'fär#ming), n. The industry of breeding and rearing sponges. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 428.

sponge-fisher (spunj'fish#ėr), n. One who fishes for sponges, or is engaged in the sponge-fishery.

sponge-fishery (spunj'fish#ėr-i), n. The process or occupation of fishing for sponges.

sponge-glass (spunj'glàs), n. 1. A bucket with a glass bottom, used in searching for sponges. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 179.—2. The flint-sponge, Hyalonema mirabilis, found on the coast of Japan.

sponge-gourd (spunj'gōrd), n. The washing- or towel-gourd, Luffa cylindrica (L. Ægyptiaca), also L. acutangula. The netted fiber from the interior of the fruit is used for washing and other purposes, hence called vegetable sponge or dish-rag. See Luffa and strainer-vine.

sponge-hook (spunj'hůk), n. See hook.

spongelet (spunj'let), n. [< sponge + -let.] 1. A little sponge. Eneyc. Diet.—2. In bot., same as spongiole.

sponge-moth (spunj'môth), n. The gipsy-moth. [Eng. and (recently) U. S.]

spongeous (spun'jus), a. [< sponge + -ous. Cf. spongious.] Same as spongy.

sponger (spun'jėr), n. [Formerly also spunger; < sponge + -er[1].] 1. One who uses a sponge.—2. A person or vessel engaged in fishing for sponges. Fisheries of U. S., V. ii. 823.—3. In cloth-manuf., a machine in which cloth is dampened previous to ironing. It has a perforated adjustable cylinder, which is filled with steam, and about which the cloth is rolled.—4. A parasitical dependent; a hanger-on for maintenance; a sponge.

Trencher-flies and spungers. Sir R. L'Estrange.

sponge-spicule (spunj'spik#ūl), n. One of the calcareous or silicious spicules peculiar to sponges. They generally appear in more or less modified geometrical figures, with definite axes represented by a non-skeletal rod or axial canal, around which the lime or silica is deposited in concentric layers. There may be one such axis or several. Sponge-spicules are either calcareous or silicious; according to their position and relations, they are either supporting-spicules or skeleton-spicules (megascleres), or flesh-spicules or tension-spicules (microscleres). Schulze has classified them, according to position, more elaborately into spicula autodermalia, autogastralia, basalia, etc. They are also grouped primarily according to their axes, next according to their rays, and finally according to their many individual figures. Thus, both calcareous and silicious spicules are monaxon, diaxon, triaxon, or tetraxon. Some silicious spicules are anaxon or polyact, giving stellate figures, either regular, as the oxyaster, euaster, and sterraster, or irregular, as the spiraster, spirula, and corona. These anaxon spicules are always flesh-spicules or microscleres. The monaxon spicules are either megascleres or microscleres; of the former are the strongylus or strongylon, oxystrongylus, oxyus or oxyon, tylotus, and tylostylus; of the latter are the toxius or toxon, toxodragma, sigma, sigmadragma, isochela, anisochela, diancistra, trichodragma, etc. Of triaxon silicious forms are the oxyhexact, oxypentact, oxytetract, oxydiact; the hexaster, oxyhexaster, discohexaster, graphiohexaster, floricome, and plumicome; the pinula, scopula, amphidisk, uncinate, and clavula. The tetraxon spicules are divided into monactinal, diactinal, triactinal, and tetractinal. The above names and classes (excepting those from Schulze) are substantially according to Lendenfeld. Sollas, the monographer of the sponges in the ninth edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," uses a similar set of terms and many others. Among the terms employed by these investigators may be noted acerella, amphiaster, amphiastrella, amphitetrad, amphitrixene, anatrixene, anthaster, arculus, aster, colthrops, candelabrum, chela, chiaster, cladome, cladus, cymba, desma, diancistron, dichotrixene, echinella, ectaster, endaster, hexaster, meniscoid, microrhabd, microstrongylon, microxeon, orthotrixene, pentact, polyact, polyaxon, protrixene, pterocymba, pycnaster, rhabd or rhabdus, sanidaster, sigmaspire, sigmella, spheraster, spherula, spinispirula, spirastrella, stellate (n.), stylus, tetract, triact, trixene, trichite, trichotrixene, triona, tylon, etc. Sponge-spicules are occasionally absent, as in gelatinous sponges. They are small or few in horny sponges, such as are used for the bath. In the glass-sponges they make magnificent structures, like spun glass, of elegant figures, and constitute most of the bulk of the sponge. See also cuts under Haliphysema, Euplectella, Hyalonemidæ, and sponge.

Various Spicules from Glass-sponges (Hexactinellida).
1, oxydiact; 2, echinate oxydiact; 3, echinate hexact; 4, amphidisk; 5, ancora; 6, tetract; 7, oxyhexact; 8, discohexaster; 9, triact.

sponge-tongs (spunj'tôngz), n. sing. and pl. Tongs used for taking sponges.

sponge-tree (spunj'trē), n. An evergreen shrub or small tree, Acacia Farnesiana, widely diffused through the tropics, and found in the United States along the Gulf of Mexico. It has slender zigzag branches, bipinnate leaves, stipular spines, and bright-yellow heads of very fragrant flowers, much used by perfumers. It is often planted for ornament.

spongewood (spunj'wụd), n. 1. The hat-plant, Æschynomene aspera, or its pith. See hat-plant and Æschynomene.—2. A plant with spongy bark, Gastonia cutispongia, of the Araliaceæ, the only species of its genus. It is an erect shrub with pinnate leaves and a panicle a foot long consisting of crowded branches with the flowers umbeled at the ends.

Spongiæ (spon'ji-ē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. spongia, a sponge: see sponge.] Sponges; the mesodermalian class of Cœlentera, having a branching canal-system (the organs of which are developed from cells of the mesoglœa, or primary mesoderm), simple epithelia, endodermal collar-cells, and no cnidoblasts or movable appendages. The class is divided by Lendenfeld into two subclasses: the Calcarea, with one order, Calcispongia; and the Silicea, with three orders, Hexactinellida, Chondrospongiæ, and Cornacuspongiæ, with many suborders, tribes, etc., and about fifty living families, besides several fossil ones. The class dates back to the Silurian. See sponge.

spongian (spon'ji-an), n. [< Spongiæ + -an.] A member of the Spongiæ; any sponge.

spongicell (spon'ji-sel), n. [< L. spongia, a sponge, + cella, a cell.] A sponge-cell.

spongicolous (spon-jik'ọ̈-lus), a. [< L. spongia, a sponge, + colere, inhabit.] Inhabiting sponges.

Spongidæ, Spongiidæ (spon'ji-dē, spon-jī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spongiæ + -idæ.] 1. Sponges; the Spongiæ.—2. A family of horny or fibrous sponges, typified by the genus Spongia, to which various limits have been assigned. In the most restricted sense the family is represented by such forms as the bath-sponges, and now called Euspongidæ.

spongiform (spon'ji-fôrm), a. [< L. spongia, a sponge, + forma, form.] 1. Having the form or structure of a sponge; poriferous, as a member of the Spongiæ; of or pertaining to the Spongiæ. Hence—2. Sponge-like; spongy; soft, elastic, and porous, like an ordinary bath-sponge: noting various objects or substances not sponges. —Spongiform quartz, floatstone.

Spongilla (spon-jil'ạ), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1816), dim. of Spongiæ, the sponges: see sponge.] The only genus of fresh-water sponges, belonging to the group Fibrospongiæ. The type-species is S. fluvialis, which grows on the banks of rivers and ponds, on submerged timber and other supports, forming thick greenish incrustations. It represents a highly specialized and somewhat aberrant family, Spongillidæ. See also cuts under ciliate and Porifera.

A Small Fresh-water Sponge, Spongilla fluviatis, with one exhalent aperture, seen from above.
a and b, ostioles, or inhalent apertures; c, ciliated chambers; d, osculum, or exhalent aperture. (Arrows indicate the direction of the current of water.)

Spongillidæ (spon-jil'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spongilla + -idæ.] The only family of sponges which are not marine, characterized by their gemmules, and typified by the genus Spongilla.

spongilline (spon'ji-lin), a. [< Spongilla + -ine[1].] Pertaining to the Spongillidæ, or having their characters.

spongin (spun'jin), n. [< sponge + -in[2].] The proper horny or fibrous substance of sponges; ceratose or ceratode. Also spongiolin.

sponginblast (spun'jin-blast), n. [< spongin + Gr. βλαστός, a germ.] One of the cells of sponges from which spongin is produced: the formative blastema in which spongin arises. W. J. Sollas, Encyc. Brit., XXII. 420. Also spongoblast.

sponginblastic (spun-jin-blas'tik), a. [< sponginblast + -ic.] Producing spongin, as a sponginblast; formative or germinating, as spongin.

sponginess (spun'ji-nes), n. The state or character of being soft and porous, or spongy; porosity: said of various objects and substances not sponges.

sponging-house (spun'jing-hous), n. [Formerly also spunging-house; < sponging, verbal n. of sponge, v., 6, + house[1].] A victualing-house or tavern where persons arrested for debt were kept by a bailiff for twenty-four hours before being lodged in prison, in order that their friends might have an opportunity of settling the debt. Sponging-houses were usually the private dwellings of bailiffs, and were so named from the extortionate charges made upon prisoners for their accommodation therein.

> A bailiff by mistake seized you for a debtor, and kept you the whole evening in a sponging-house.
> Swift, Advice to Servants (General Directions).

Spongiocarpeæ (spon″ji-ọ̄-kär'pē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σπογγιά, a sponge, + καρπός, a fruit, + -eæ.] An order of florideous algæ, founded upon a single species, Polyides rotundus. The fronds are blackish-red, cylindrical, cartilaginous, from 3 to 6 inches long, and attached by a disk, with an undivided stipe, which becomes repeatedly dichotomous above. The cystocarps are in external flesh-colored wart-like protuberances, which are borne on the upper parts of the frond. It grows on stones in deep water.

spongiole (spon'ji-ōl), n. [= F. spongiole, < L. spongiola, dim. of spongia, a sponge: see sponge.] In bot., a former name of the spongy tissue of a root-tip, from its supposed property of sucking up moisture like a sponge. Also called spongelet.

sp, Spongiole (magnified).

spongiolin (spon'ji-ọ̄-lin), n. [< spongiole + -in[2].] Same as spongin. W. J. Sollas, Encyc. Brit., XXII. 416.

spongiolite (spon'ji-ọ̄-līt), n. [< Gr. σπογγίον, dim. of σπόγγος, sponge (see sponge), + λίθος, stone.] A fossil sponge-spicule; one of the minute silicious elements of a sponge in a fossil state.

spongiolitic (spon″ji-ọ̄-lit'ik), a. [< spongiolite + -ic.] Of the nature of a spongiolite; containing spongiolites, or characterized by their presence: as, spongiolitic flint.

spongiopiline (spon″ji-ọ̄-pī'lin), n. [< Gr. σπογγίον, dim. of σπόγγος, sponge, + πῖλος, felt, + -ine[2].] A substitute for cataplasms. It is a thick cloth into which sponge is incorporated in the weaving, in a manner analogous to that of pile-weaving, to form a uniform pile, and coated on the opposite side with rubber.

spongioplasm (spon'ji-ọ̄-plazm), n. [< Gr. σπογγίον, dim. of σπόγγος, sponge, + πλάσμα, anything formed or molded: see plasm.] The substance, resembling neuroglia, which supports the so-called "primitive tubules" or subdivisions of nerve-fiber containing hyaloplasm. Nansen, 1886.

> The primitive tubes are the meshes in a supporting substance designated as "spongioplasm," a substance described as similar to the neuroglia which forms the sheath of the nerve tube or fibre. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 487.

spongioplasmic (spon″ji-ọ̄-plaz'mik), a. [< spongioplasm + -ic.] Of the nature of, or pertaining to, spongioplasm. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 487.

spongiose (spon'ji-ōs), a. [< L. spongiosus: see spongious.] Same as spongy.

spongious (spon'ji-us), a. [< F. spongieux = Sp. Pg. esponjoso = It. spugnoso, < L. spongiosus, spongeosus, porous, < spongia, a sponge: see sponge.] Spongy.

spongiozoön (spon″ji-ọ̄-zō'on), n.; pl. spongiozoa (-ạ). [NL., < Gr. σπογγίον, a sponge, + ζῷον, an animal.] A sponge. Also spongozoön.

spongite (spon'jīt), n. [< L. spongia, sponge, + -ite[2].] A fossil sponge.

spongitic (spon-jit'ik), a. [< spongite + -ic.] Of the nature of a fossil sponge; containing or characterized by the fossil remains of sponges.

spongoblast (spong'gọ̄-blast), n. [< Gr. σπόγγος, sponge, + βλαστός, germ.] Same as sponginblast.

Spongodieæ (spong-gọ̄-dī'ẹ̄-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σπογγώδης, σπογγοειδής, sponge-like, spongy (see spongoid), + -eæ.] An order of siphonocladaceous algæ, typified by the genus Codium. They form spongy spherical or cylindrical floating masses, consisting of branched tubes.

spongoid (spong'goid), a. [< Gr. σπογγοειδής, σπογγώδης (also σφογγοειδής, σφογγώδης), sponge-like, < σπόγγος, sponge, + εἶδος, form.] Spongiform, in any sense; spongy.

spongological (spong-gọ̄-loj'i-kạl), a. [< spongology + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to spongology, or the science of sponges.

spongologist (spong-gol'ọ̄-jist), n. [< spongology + -ist.] One who is versed in the science of sponges.

spongology (spong-gol'ọ̄-ji), n. [< Gr. σπόγγος, a sponge, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science of sponges; the study of the Spongiæ, and the body of knowledge thence obtained.

spongomeral (spong'gọ̄-mēr-ạl), a. [< spongomere + -al.] Of or pertaining to a spongomere; choanosomal, as that part of a sponge which is characterized by flagellated chambers.

spongomere (spong'gọ̄-mēr), n. [< Gr. σπόγγος, a sponge, + μέρος, a part.] The upper, choanosomal part of a sponge, characterized by the presence of flagellated chambers: distinguished from hypomere. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 415.

spongozoön (spong-gọ̄-zō'on), n. [< Gr. σπόγγος, sponge, + ζῷον, animal.] Same as spongiozoön. Hyatt.

spongy (spun'ji), a. [Formerly also spungy; < sponge + -y[1].] 1. Of the nature or character of a sponge; spongiform or spongoid.—2. Resembling a sponge in certain particulars; soft or elastic and porous; of open, loose, compressible texture, like a bath-sponge; punky, pithy, or soft-grained, as wood; boggy or soggy, as soil; absorbent; imbibitive. See cuts under cellular and cystolith.
